What is the origin of the New Testament saying: "There be eunuchs which have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven’s sake"?"

Wasn’t self-castration practically unheard of among the Jews?

But in neighbouring Edessa" self-castration of the Atargatis priests was the rule.

In that same place, incidentally, there were 180 ft. high "spires" or minarets in phallic form.

Why is the phallus usually represented as winged? (Joke: "The mere thought lifts it.")

Do you know those early mediaeval lead medallions in Paris, on one side the Christian cross, on the other a penis or vulva?

And the penis-cross of Sant’Agata de’Goti? (Inaccurate illustration in Inman.)

There seem to be indications of early mediaeval phallus worship.

I have recommended Frl. Dr. L. von Karpinska to Dr. Jekels. Frl. Cincburg’" couldn’t be traced.

Dear Professor Freud, 27March 1912

Many thanks for the second edition of Cradiva.

I quite agree with your proposal.

I shall notify the local groups accordingly, i.e., I presume that I have to consult them.

Perhaps we can hold the Congress next spring.

Bleuler has demanded the return of one of the manuscripts already with ‚Deuticke,' a very fine Dem. praec. analysis, for fear of public opinion in Zurich.

He could have done this long ago, so it is just another low trick.

Of course it was a paper produced at the Clinic, which I have now wasted a lot of time correcting.

Please excuse the "meagreness" of this "letter."

You will be hearing more from me very soon.

Best regards,

Most sincerely yours,

Carl Jung: Thus "omnipotence" will later be included in the symptomatology of obsessional neurosis.

(2019-06-14 04:05)

Sigmund Freud
(1856 - 1939)
Carl Gustav Jung
(1875 - 1961)

Dear Professor Freud, Kusnacht Zurich, 14 December 1909

Your letter came yesterday evening and I am replying at once.

Your impressions of Binswanger’s paper tally with my own, though I haven’t dared to say so out loud.

I too was annoyed with B. for pushing the business end so blatantly to the fore; his obeisances in various directions obviously amount to just that.

Oh well, he has a sanatorium round his neck, so I suppose we must stretch a point.

Besides, there is a colossal and apparently still unresolved father complex rumbling in his depths.

May I expect something from you for the January issue of the Jahrbuch?

Contributions are coming from Maeder, Abraham, Sadger, Pfister, Riklin and me.

So space is already tight.

Pfister or Riklin could be held in reserve if necessary.

So far as I have heard, Ferenczi’s paper’ is greatly appreciated here.

He wrote me a very nice letter, so understanding and friendly that I probably sent him a very clumsy answer."

Such letters should really be answered with a blank page, but that too would look unfriendly.

I have made some glosses on your Obsessional Neurosis.

The notion that obsessional ideas are, by their very nature, regressive substitutes for action sounds very convincing to me.

The formula for D. pro ideas would be: regressive substitutes for reality.

Both formulae, it seems to me, describe the main tendency very aptly.

With reference to p. 415, the sadistic component of libido, I must remark that I don't like the idea of sadism being constitutional.

I think of it rather as a reactive phenomenon, since for me the constitutional basis of the neuroses is the imbalance between libido and resistance (self-assertion).

If, at the start, the libido displayed too strong an attraction or need for love, hate would soon appear by way of compensation, and would subtract a good deal of the work of gratification from the masochistic libido (which by nature is much more nearly akin Ito masochism than to sadism).

I think this is the basis for the immense self-assertion that appears later on in obsessional neurosis: the patient is always afraid of losing his ego, must take revenge for every act of love, and gives up the sexually destructive obsessional system only with the greatest reluctance.

Obsessional neurosis never gets lost in actions and adventures as in the case of hysteria, where ego-loss is a temporary necessity.

Obviously the self-assertion in obsessional neurosis is far exceeded in D.pr.

P. 411,4 omnipotence of his thoughts.

This expression is certainly very significant in this particular case.

But I have misgivings about attributing any general validity to it.

It seems to me much too specific.

Of course it is idiotic of me to find fault with your clinical terminology, to which you have as much right as the next man.

But, like Herakles of old, you are a human hero and demi-god, wherefore your dicta unfortunately carry with them a sempiternal value.

All the weaker ones who come after you must of necessity adopt your nomenclature, originally intended to fit a specific case.

Thus "omnipotence" will later be included in the symptomatology of obsessional neurosis.

But this seems to me only an expression of self-assertion sadistically coloured by reactive hypercathexis and to be on a par with all the other symptoms of self-overvaluation, which always has such a hurtful effect on everyone in ·the vicinity.

Here, it seems to me, we also have the reason for the obsessional neurotic's boundless belief in the rightness of his conclusions; they are taken as universally valid regardless of all reason and logical probability: he is and must remain right.

From this rightness of his ideas, which brooks no exception, it is only a step to superstition, which in turn is only a special instance of self-hypercathexis, or rather weakness in adaptation (the two always go together).

All superstition springs from this soil; it has been the weak man's weapon of attack and defence from time immemorial.

It is not uncommon for the enfeebled to go in for witchcraft, especially old women who have long since lost their natural witchery.

The question of the original sexual constitution seems to me particularly difficult.

Would it not be simplest, for the time being, to start with sensitivity" as the general foundation of neurosis, and to regard all other abnormal conditions as reactive phenomena?

I have just finished my American lectures and have sent them to Brill Ito translate.

Congratulations on the Italian translation!

With kindest regards,

Yours,

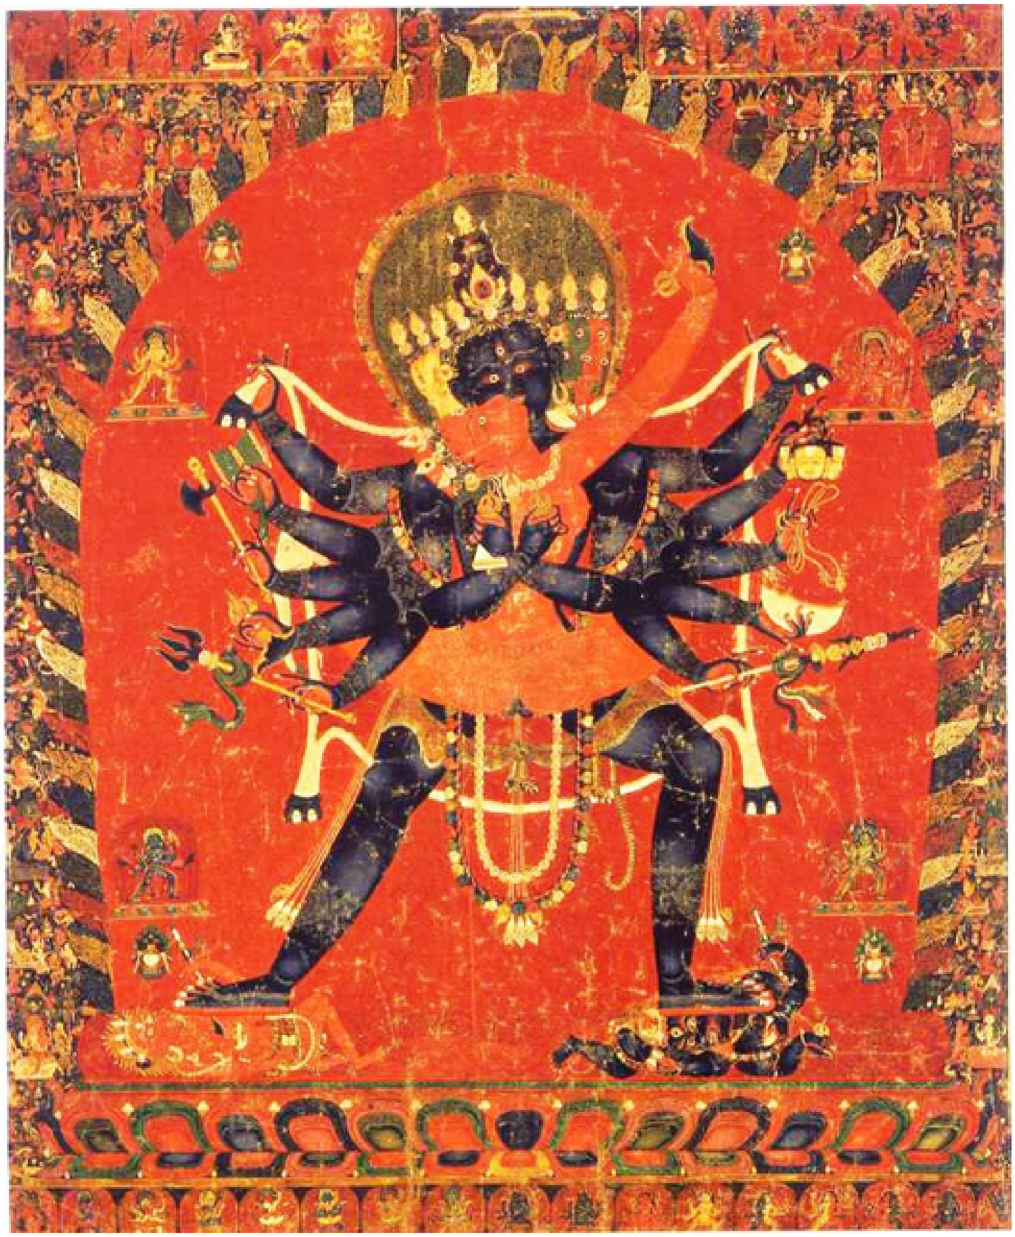
Carl Jung an Alchemical Stages (2019-06-14 04:07)

[1]



The third and highest degree of conjunction was the union of the whole man with the unus mundus . . .

the potential world of the first day of creation, when nothing was yet "in actu," i.e. divided into two and many but was still one. . .

the eternal Ground of all empirical being. . . .

The third degree of conjunction is universal: it is relation or identity of the personal with the supra-personal atman, and of the individual Tao with the universal Tao. . . .

He [the alchemist Dorn] expressly meant not a fusion of the individual with his environment, or even his adaptation Undoubtedly the idea of the unus mundus is founded on the assumption that the multiplicity of the empirical world rests on an underlying unity. . .

everything different and divided belongs to one and the same world. . . .

All that is not encompassed by our knowledge, so that we are not in a position to make any statements about its total nature. . . .

But this much we do know beyond all doubt, that empirical reality has a transcendental background.

. . . The common background of microphysics and depth psychology is as much physical as psychic and therefore neither, but rather a third thing, a neutral nature which can at most be grasped in hints since in essence it is transcendental.

. . . The transcendental psychophysical background corresponds to a "potential world.". . .

The third and highest conjunction. . .

would consist, psychologically, in a synthesis of the conscious with the unconscious.

The result of this conjunction or equation is theoretically inconceivable, since a known quantity is combined with an unknown one; but in practice as many far reaching changes of consciousness result from it as atomic physics has produced in classical physics. . . .

Not unnaturally, we are at a loss to see how a psychic experience of this kind - for such it evidently was - can be formulated as a rational concept.

Undoubtedly it was meant as the essence of perfection and universality, and, as such, it characterized an experience of similar proportions.

We could compare this only with the ineffable mystery of the unio mystica, or Tao, or the content of Samadhi, or the experience of satori in Zen, which would bring us to the realm of the ineffable and of extreme subjectivity where all the criteria of reason fail.

Remarkably enough this experience is an empirical one in so far as there are unanimous testimonies from the East and West alike, both from the present and from the distant past, which confirm its unsurpassable subjective significance. . . .

It is and remains a secret of the world of psychic experience and can be understood only as a numinous event.

The union of Tantric deities can embody unio mystica at the levels of the synthesis of opposites: the conscious and unconscious, the personal with the supra-personal.

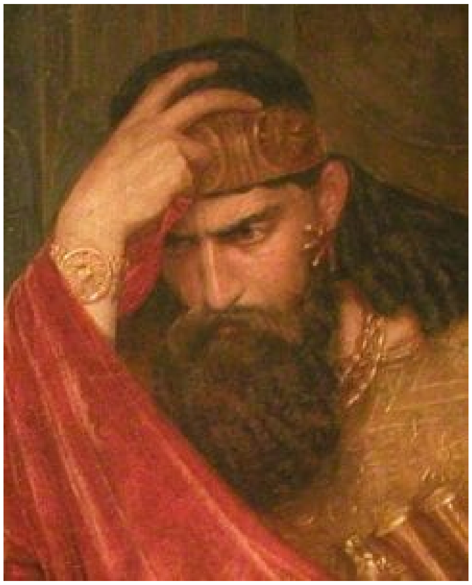
Carl Jung on "Prophecy" - Anthology (2019-06-14 12:11)



Carl Jung on “Prophecy.” - Anthology

Being a scientist I prefer not to be a prophet if I can help it. I am in no position to ascertain facts of the future. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 513.

In my estimation, second sight is not an illness, but a gift; you might as well say that it is pathological to be endowed with remarkable intelligence, but the possession of a gift always carries with it the burden of responsibility. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture V, Page 26.

We can have prophetic dreams without possessing second sight, innumerable people have such anticipatory dreams. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture V, Page 26.

It is commonly assumed that on some given occasion in prehistoric times, the basic mythological ideas were "invented" by a clever old philosopher or prophet, and ever afterward "believed" by a credulous and uncritical people. But the very word "invent" is derived from the Latin invenire, and means "to find" and hence to find something by "seeking" it. Carl Jung; Man and His Symbols; Page 69.

The prophet loved God, and this sanctified him. But Salome did not love God, and this profaned her. But the prophet did not love Salome, and this profaned him. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 248.

Myths which day has forgotten continue to be told by night, and powerful figures which consciousness has reduced to banality and ridiculous triviality are recognized again by poets and prophetically revived; therefore they can also be recognized "in changed form" by the thoughtful person. Carl Jung, Memories Dreams and Reflections, Page 282.

Through his inner vision the prophet discerns from the needs of his time the helpful image in the collective unconscious and expresses it in the symbol: because it speaks out of the collective unconscious it speaks for everyone-le vrai mot de la situation! Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 59-63.

The old prophet expresses persistence, but the young maiden denotes movement. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 365.

On the night when I considered the essence of the God, I became aware of an image: I lay in a dark depth. An old man stood before me. He looked like one of the old prophets. A black serpent lay at his feet. Some distance away I saw a house with columns. A beautiful maiden steps out of the door. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 245.

Just as the old prophets [ancients] stood before the Mysterium of Christ, I also stand as yet before the [this] Mysterium of-Christ, [insofar as I reassume the past] although I live two thousand years after-him [later] and at one time believed I was a Christian. But I had never been a Christ. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 253, Footnote 228.

We could say that western man became conscious of the fact that this man, this teacher Jesus, was the divine man, whose path had been prepared for thousands of years by Osiris in Egypt and as the idea of the coming of the Messiah in Israel. This was no human conspiracy, probably Christ had a convincing effect, there was something about him which carried the conviction that he was filled with the spirit of God, that he was a prophet. Carl Jung, ETH Lectures, Page 201.

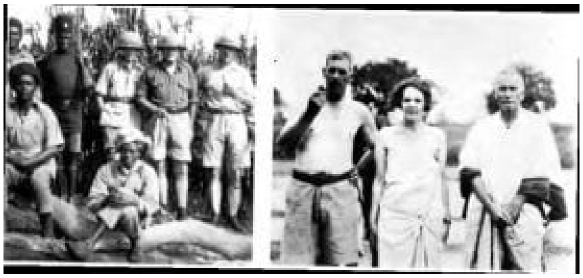
The form inwhich Christ presented the content of his unconscious to the world became accepted and was declared valid for all. Thereafter all individual fantasies became otiose and worthless, and were persecuted as heretical, as the fate of the Gnostic movement and of all later heresies testifies. The prophet Jeremiah is speaking just in this vein when he warns Carl Jung, CW 6, §BI.

E: "She loved the prophet who announced the new God to the world. She loved him, do you understand that? For she is my daughter."

I: "What my eyes see is exactly what I cannot grasp. You, Elijah, who are a prophet, the mouth of God, and she, a bloodthirsty horror. You are the symbol of the most extreme contradiction." Elijah to Carl Jung on Salome, Liber Novus, Page 246

I will be no savior, no lawgiver, no master teacher unto you. You are no longer little children. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 231

Carl Jung in "North Africa" (2019-06-14 12:40)



At the beginning of 1920 a friend told me that he had a business trip to make to Tunis, and would I like to accompany him?

I said yes immediately.

We set out in March, going first to Algiers.

Following the coast, we reached Tunis and from there Sousse, where I left my friend to his business affairs.

At last I was where I had longed to be: in a non-European country where no European language was spoken and no Christian conceptions prevailed, where a different race lived and a different historical tradition and philosophy had set its stamp upon the face of the crowd.

I had often wished to be able for once to see the European from outside, his image reflected back at him by an altogether foreign milieu.

To be sure, there was my ignorance of the Arabic language, which I deeply regretted; but to make up for this I was all the more attentive in observing the people and their behavior.

Frequently I sat for hours in an Arab coffee house, listening to conversations of which I understood not a word.

But I studied the people's gestures, and especially their expression of emotions; I observed the subtle change in their gestures when they spoke with a European, and thus learned to see to some extent with different eyes and to know the white man outside his own environment.

What the Europeans regard as Oriental calm and apathy seemed to me a mask; behind it I sensed a restlessness, a degree of agitation, which I could not explain.

Strangely, in setting foot upon Moorish soil, I found myself haunted by an impression which I myself could not understand: I kept thinking that the land smelled queer.

It was the smell of blood, as though the soil were soaked with blood.

This strip of land, it occurred to me, had already borne the brunt of three civilizations: Carthaginian, Roman, and Christian.

What the technological age will do with Islam remains to be seen.

When I left Sousse, I traveled south to Sfax, and thence into the Sahara, to the oasis city of Tozeur.

The city lies on a slight elevation, on the margin of a plateau, at whose foot lukewarm, slightly saline springs well up profusely and irrigate the oasis through a thousand little canals.

Towering date palms formed a green, shady roof overhead, under which peach, apricot, and fig trees flourished, and beneath these alfalfa of an unbelievable green.

Several kingfishers, shining like jewels, flitted through the foliage.

In the comparative coolness of this green shade strolled figures clad in white, among them a great number of affectionate couples holding one another in close embrace obviously homosexual friendships.

I felt suddenly transported to the times of classical Greece, where this inclination formed the cement of a society of men and of the polls based on that society.

It was clear that men spoke to men and women to women here.

Only a few of the latter were to be seen, nunlike, heavily veiled figures.

I saw a few without veils.

These, my dragoman explained, were prostitutes.

On the main streets the scene was dominated by men and children.

My dragoman confirmed my impression of the prevalence of homosexuality, and of its being taken for granted, and promptly made me offers.

The good fellow could have no notion of the thoughts which had struck me like a flash of lightning, suddenly illuminating my point of observation.

I felt cast back many centuries to an infinitely more naive world of adolescents who were preparing, with the aid of a slender knowledge of the Koran, to emerge from their original state of twilight consciousness, in which they had existed from time immemorial, and to become aware of their own existence, in self-defense against the forces threatening them from the North.

While I was still caught up in this dream of a static, age-old existence,

I suddenly thought of my pocket watch, the symbol of the European’s accelerated tempo.

This, no doubt, was the dark cloud that hung threateningly over the heads of these unsuspecting souls.

They suddenly seemed to me like game who do not see the hunter but, vaguely uneasy, scent him Turn" being the god of time who will inevitably chop into the bits and pieces of days, hours, minutes, and seconds that duration which is still the closest thing to eternity.

From Tozeur I went on to the oasis of Nefta. I rode off with my dragoman early in the morning, shortly after sunrise.

Our mounts were large, swift-footed mules, on which we made rapid progress.

As we approached the oasis, a single rider, wholly swathed in white, came toward us.

With proud bearing he rclde by without offering us any greeting, mounted on a black mule whose harness was banded and studded with silver.

He made an impressive, elegant figure.

Here was a man who certainly possessed no pocket watch, let alone a wrist watch; for he was obviously and unself-consciously the person he had always been.

He lacked that faint note of foolishness which clings to the European.

The European is, to be sure, convinced that he is no longer what he was ages ago; but he does not know what he has since become.

His watch tells him that since the "Middle Ages" time and its synonym, progress, have crept up on him and irrevocably taken something from him.

With lightened baggage he continues his journey, with steadily increasing velocity, toward nebulous goals.

He compensates for the loss of gravity and the corresponding sentiment cFincompl &itude by the illusion of his triumphs, such as steamships, railroads, airplanes, and rockets, that rob him of his duration and transport him into another reality of speeds and explosive accelerations.

The deeper we penetrated into the Sahara, the more time slowed down for me; it even threatened to move backward.

The shimmering heat waves rising up contributed a good deal to my dreamy state, and when we reached the first palms and dwellings of the oasis, it seemed to me that everything here was exactly the way it should be and the way it had always been.

Early the next morning I was awakened by the various unfamiliar noises outside my inn.

There was a large open square which had been empty the night before, but which was now crowded with people, camels, mules, and donkeys.

The camels groaned and announced in manifold variations of tone thenchronic discontent, and the donkeys competed with cacophonous screams.

The people ran around in a great state of excitement, shouting and gesticulating.

They looked savage and rather alarming.

My dragoman explained that a great festival was being celebrated that day.

Several desert tribes had come in during the night to do two days of field work for the marabout.

The marabout was the administrator of poor relief and owned many fields in the oasis.

The people were to lay out a new field and irrigation canals to match.

At the farther end of the square there suddenly rose a cloud of dust; a green flag unfolded, and drums rolled.

At the head of a long procession of hundreds of wild-looking men carrying baskets and short, wide hoes appeared a white-bearded, venerable old man.

He radiated inimitable natural dignity, as though he were a hundred years old.

This was the marabout, astride a white mule.

The men danced around him, beating small drums.

The scene was one of wild excitement, hoarse shouting, dust, and heat.

With fanatic purposefulness the procession swarmed by, out into the oasis, as if going to .battle.

I followed this horde at a cautious distance, and my dragoman made no attempt to encourage me to approach closer until we reached the spot where the "work" was going on.

Here, if possible, even greater excitement prevailed; people were beating drums and shouting wildly; the site of the work resembled a disturbed anthill; everything was being done with the utmost haste.

Carrying their baskets filled with heavy loads of earth, men danced along to the rhythm of the drums; others hacked into the ground at a furious rate, digging ditches and erecting dams.

Through this wild tumult die marabout rode along on his white mule, evidently issuing instructions with the dignified, mild, and weary gestures of advanced age.

Wherever he came, the haste, shouting, and rhythm intensified, forming the background against which the calm figure of the holy man stood out with extraordinary effectiveness.

Toward evening the crowd was visibly overcome by exhaustion; the men soon dropped down beside their camels into deep sleep.

During the night, after the usual stupendous concert of the dogs, utter stillness prevailed, until at the first rays of the rising sun the invocation of the muezzin which always deeply stirred me summoned the people to their morning prayer.

This scene taught me something: these people live from their affects, are moved and have their being in emotions.

Their consciousness takes care of their ’orientation in space and transmits impressions from outside, and it is also stirred by inner impulses and affects.

But it is not given to reflection; the ego has almost no autonomy.

The situation is not so different with the European; but we are, after all, somewhat more complicated.

At any rate the European possesses a certain measure of will and directed intention.

What we lack is intensity of life.

Without wishing to fall under the spell of the primitive, I nevertheless had been psychically infected.

This manifested itself outwardly in an infectious enteritis which cleared up after a few days, thanks to the local treatment of rice water and calomel

Overcharged with ideas, I finally went back to Tunis.

The night before we embarked from Marseilles I had a dream which, I sensed, summed up the whole experience.

This was just as it should be, for I had accustomed myself to living always on two planes simultaneously, one conscious, which attempted to understand and could not, and one unconscious, which wanted to express something and could not formulate it any better than by a dream.

I dreamt that I was in an Arab city, and as in most such cities there was a citadel, a casbah.

The city was situated in a broad plain, and had a wall all around it.

The shape of the wall was square, and there were four gates.

The casbah in the interior of the city was surrounded by a wide moat (which is not the way it really is in Arab countries).

I stood before a wooden bridge leading over the water to a dark, horseshoe-shaped portal, which was open.

Eager to see the citadel from the inside also, I stepped out on the bridge.

When I was about halfway across it, a handsome, dark Arab of aristocratic, almost royal bearing came toward me from the gate.

I knew that this youth in the white burnoose was the resident prince of the citadel.

When he came up to me, he attacked me and tried to knock me down.

We wrestled.

In the struggle we crashed against the railing; it gave way and both of us fell into the moat, where he tried to push my head under water to drown me.

No, I thought, this is going too far.

And in my turn I pushed his head under water.

I did so although I felt great admiration for him; but I did not want to let myself be killed.

I had no intention of killing him; I wanted only to make him unconscious and incapable of fighting.

Then the scene of the dream changed, and he was with me in a large vaulted octagonal room in the center of the citadel.

The room was all white, very plain and beautiful.

Along the lightcolored marble walls stood low divans, and before me on the floor lay an open book with black letters written in magnificent calligraphy on milky-white parchment.

It was not Arabic script; rather, it looked to me like the Uigurian script of West Turkestan, which was familiar to me from the Manichaean fragments from Turfan.

I did not know the contents, but nevertheless I had the feeling that this was "my book," that I had written it.

The young prince with whom I had just been wrestling sat to the right of me on the floor.

I explained to him that now that I had overcome him he must read the book.

But he resisted.

I placed my arm around his shoulders and forced him, with a sort of paternal kindness and patience, to read the book.

I knew that this was absolutely essential, and at last he yielded.

In this dream, the Arab youth was the double of the proud Arab who had ridden past us without a greeting.

As an inhabitant of the casbah he was a figuration of the self, or rather, a messenger or emissary of the self.

For the casbah from which he came was a perfect mandala: a citadel surrounded by a square wall with four gates.

His attempt to kill me was an echo of the motif of Jacob's struggle with the angel; he was to use the language of the Bible like an angel of the Lord, a messenger of God who wished to kill men because he did not know them.

Actually, the angel ought to have had his dwelling in me.

But he knew only angelic truth and understood nothing about man.

Therefore he first came forward as my enemy; however, I held my own against him.

In the second part of the dream I was the master of the citadel; he sat at my feet and had to learn to understand my thoughts, or rather, learn to know man.

Obviously, my encounter with Arab culture had struck me with overwhelming force.

The emotional nature of these unreflective people who are so much closer to life than we are exerts a strong suggestive influence upon those historical layers in ourselves which we have just overcome and left behind, or which we think we have overcome.

It is like the paradise of childhood from which we imagine we have emerged, but which at the slightest provocation imposes fresh defeats upon us.

Indeed, our cult of progress is in danger of imposing on us even more childish dreams of the future, the harder it presses us to escape from the past.

On the other hand, a characteristic of childhood is that, thanks to its naivet and unconsciousness, it sketches a more complete picture of the self, of the whole man in his pure individuality, than adulthood.

Consequently, the sight of a child or a primitive will arouse certain longings in adult, civilized persons longings which relate to the unfulfilled desires and needs of those parts of the personality which have been blotted out of the total picture in favor of the adapted persona.

In traveling to Africa to find a psychic observation post outside the sphere of the European, I unconsciously wanted to find that part of my personality which had become invisible under the influence and the pressure of being European.

This part stands in unconscious opposition to myself, and indeed I attempt to suppress it.

In keeping with its nature, it wishes to make me unconscious (force me under water) so as to kill me; but my aim is, through insight, to make it more conscious, so that we can find a common modus vivendi.

The Arab’s dusky complexion marks him as a "shadow," but not the personal shadow, rather an ethnic one associated not with my persona but with the totality of my personality, that is, with the self.

As master of the casbah, he must be regarded as a kind of shadow of the self.

The predominantly rationalistic European finds much that is human alien to him, and he prides himself on this without realizing that his rationality is won at the expense of his vitality, and that the primitive part of his personality is consequently condemned to a more or less underground existence.

The dream reveals how my encounter with North Africa affected me.

First of all there was the danger that my European consciousness would be overwhelmed by an unexpectedly violent assault of the unconscious psyche.

Consciously, I was not a bit aware of any such situation; on the contrary, I could not help feeling superior because I was reminded at every step of my Europeanism.

That was unavoidable; my being European gave me a certain perspective on these people who were so differently constituted from myself, and utterly marked me off from them.

But I was not prepared for the existence of unconscious forces within myself which would take the part of these strangers with such intensity, so that a violent conflict ensued.

The dream expressed this conflict in the symbol of an attempted murder.

I was not to recognize the real nature of this disturbance until some years later, when I stayed in tropical Africa.

It had been, in fact, the first hint of "going black under the skin," a spiritual peril which threatens the uprooted European in Africa to an extent not fully appreciated.

"Where danger is, there is salvation also" these words of Holderlin often came to my mind in such situations.

The salvation lies in our ability to bring the unconscious urges to consciousness with the aid of warning dreams.

These dreams show that there is something in us which does not merely submit passively to the influence of the unconscious, but on the contrary rushes eagerly to meet it, identifying itself with the shadow.

Just as a childhood memory can suddenly take possession of consciousness with so lively an emotion that we feel wholly transported back to the original situation, so these seemingly alien and wholly different Arab surroundings awaken an archetypal memory of an only too well known prehistoric past which apparently we have entirely forgotten.

We are remembering a potentiality of life which has been overgrown by civilization, but which in certain places is still existent.

If we were to relive it naively, it would constitute a relapse into barbarism.

Therefore we prefer to forget it.

But should it appear to us again in the form of a conflict, then we should keep it in our consciousness and test the two possibilities against each other the Me we live and the one we have forgotten.

For what has apparently been lost does not come to the fore again without sufficient reason.

In the living psychic structure, nothing takes place in a merely mechanical fashion; everything fits into the economy of the whole, relates to the whole.

That is to say, it is all purposeful and has meaning.

But because consciousness never has a view of the whole, it usually cannot understand this meaning.

We must therefore content ourselves for the time being with noting the phenomenon and hoping that the future, or further investigation, will reveal the significance of this clash with the shadow of the self. In any case,

I did not at the time have any glimmering of the nature of this archetypal experience, and knew still less about the historical parallels.

Yet though I did not then grasp the full meaning of the dream, it lingered in my memory, along with the liveliest wish to go to Africa again at the next opportunity.

That wish was not to be fulfilled for another five years.   Carl Jung, Memories, Dreams and Reflections, Pages 238-246

Ronald Hayman's lack of scholarship and erroneous assumptions and assertions uncovered

In 1999, Ronald Hayman, another professional biographer, published his biography of Jung,

A Life of Jung. Hayman was the first biographer who was aware of the status of Memories, Dreams, Reflections, and drew on the protocols of Aniela Jaffé's interviews with Jung.

Furthermore, he was the first biographer to draw on the Countway interviews, supplemented with some interviews of his own.

Of the biographers of Jung to date, Hayman devoted the most space, comparatively speaking, to giving summaries of Jung's actual writings.

Also, he did not rely on existing translations of Jung's works, and sometimes revised existing translations and supplied his own.

Like the previous biographers, Hayman did not consult the Jung archives in Zürich.

Like Stern, Brome and McLynn before him, Hayman presented his own retrospective analysis of Jung.

This is particularly marked in his account of Jung's "confrontation with the unconscious", which he regarded as a breakdown.

Hayman employed Ellenberger's rubric of the "creative illness", but went further in stressing what he considered to be the psychopathological nature of Jung's experiences.

In his reading of Jung's Siegfried dream, Hayman contended that Jung's "need to keep silent" about Sabina Spielrein stopped him from "writing honestly about this dream", as Siegfried obviously signified Spielrein's Siegfried fantasy—a connection which had been posited by Wehr.

The assumption that one knows what this dream "really meant" led to the claim that Jung did not write honestly about it.

Like Brome and McLynn, Hayman saw Freud as the critical figure in Jung's "confrontation with the unconscious". In his discussion of the figures of Salome and Elijah, he noted:

One factor in his disorientation was the loss of the people who mattered to him most—Freud and Sabina. Both Jewish, they could be both be associated with the Old Testament. Though he was to speculate at length about the meaning of Salome and Elijah—pointing out that in myth an old man is often accompanied by a young girl who represents the erotic while he represents wisdom—he never made the obvious equations. . . . Like dissidents who have been eliminated in a Soviet purge and vanish from new prints of old photographs, they are mentioned in none of Jung's accounts of his dreams and visions. It was as he had forbidden himself to think about them. . . . Perhaps he saw it but he did not dare to admit he was conflating Sabina with Lou Andreas-Salomé.

Nowhere is evidence provided for such claims.

Hayman's interpretations are taken as facts, and he gives the impression of knowing the hidden content of Jung's mind.

Regarding Jung's own interpretations of his experience, Hayman argued that Jung "always tended to mythologise his experience, and now he was verging on psychosis, Gnosticism gave him a kind of licence".

It is striking how many commentators have reinterpreted Jung's fantasies in terms of people in his life, leaving to one side his own interpretations of them in terms of subjective tendencies or functions of his personality. Jung's tendency to personification, such as in the figure of Philemon, Hayman read in terms of the tendencies of schizophrenics.

He attributed "delusions of grandeur" to Jung.

Furthermore, central features of Jung's work are attributed to such tendencies:

"His inclination to believe in what he called the independence of the unconscious is in line with his boyhood refusal to accept responsibility for such images as the giant penis and the divine turd."

Psychobiography thus becomes a tool of criticism.

Jung becomes remade according to each biographer's fixed ideas.

Critically, none of the biographies discussed in this chapter drew upon Jung's extensive unpublished manuscripts and notes, nor on his voluminous correspondence at the ETH.

These are available for scholars to study upon application.

Nor did any of the biographers have access to the Jung family archives, which contains private materials, such as Jung’s correspondence with his wife, the Black Books, and the Red Book.

Thus, the most important unpublished materials remained unexamined.

Confronted by this situation, one could simply base oneself on what is known, and be careful not to overstep the bounds of the available documentation.

The works of Hannah and Wehr can generally be seen to fall into this category.

On the other hand, there is the danger of filling in the gaps of the available information with intreprefactions.

The works of Stern, McLynn, Brome, and Hayman at times fall into this category. Sonu Shamdasani, Jung Stripped Bare: By His Biographers Even, Pages 84-86

But just as Judas is a necessary link in the chain of the work of redemption, so is our Judas betrayal of the hero also a necessary passageway to redemption.

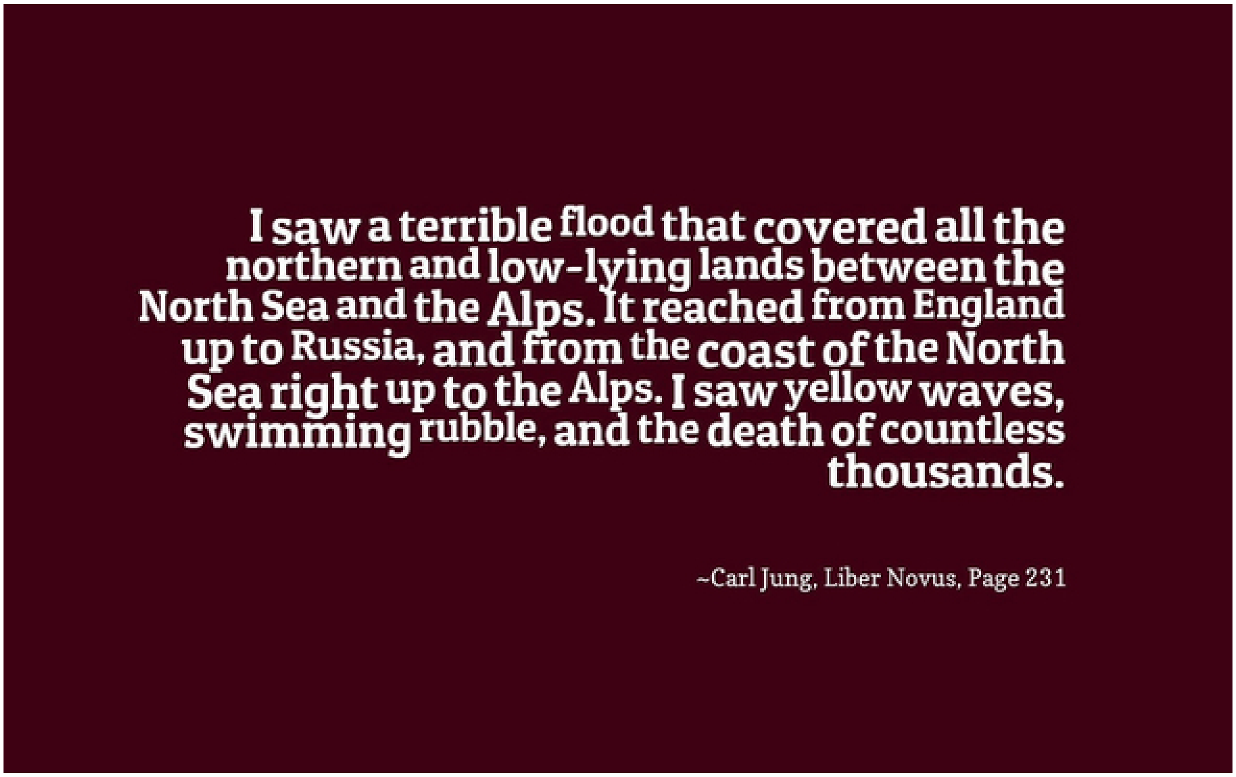
But just as Judas is a necessary link in the chain of the work of redemption, so is our Judas betrayal of the hero also a necessary passageway to redemption. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Footnote 107, Page 242.

[4]



I saw a terrible flood that covered all the northern and low-lying lands between the North Sea and the Alps. It reached from England up to Russia, and from the coast of the North Sea right up to the Alps. I saw yellow waves, swimming rubble, and the death of countless thousands.

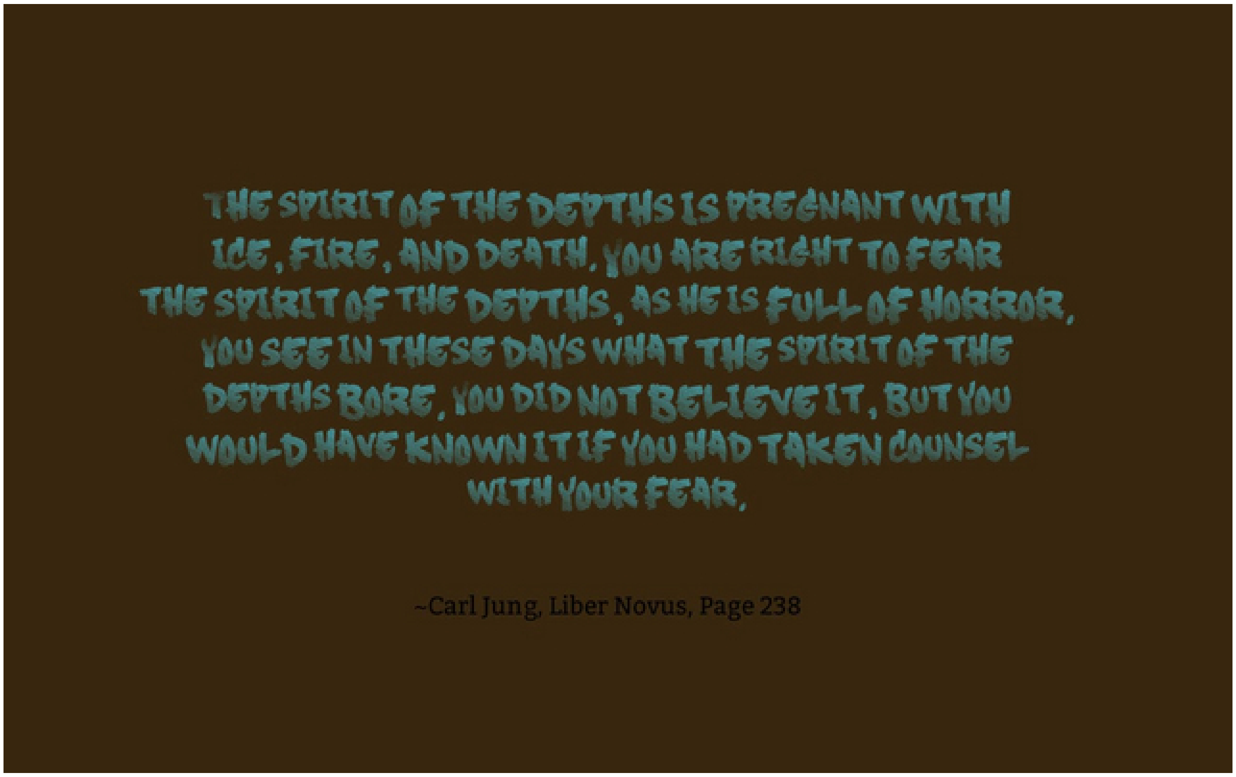
[7]



THE SPIRIT OF THE DEPTHS IS PREGNANT WITH ICE, FIRE, AND DEATH. YOU ARE RIGHT TO FEAR THE SPIRIT OF THE DEPTHS, AS HE IS FULL OF HORROR. YOU SEE IN THESE DAYS WHAT THE SPIRIT OF THE DEPTHS BORE. YOU DID NOT BELIEVE IT, BUT YOU WOULD HAVE KNOWN IT IF YOU HAD TAKEN COUNSEL WITH YOUR FEAR.

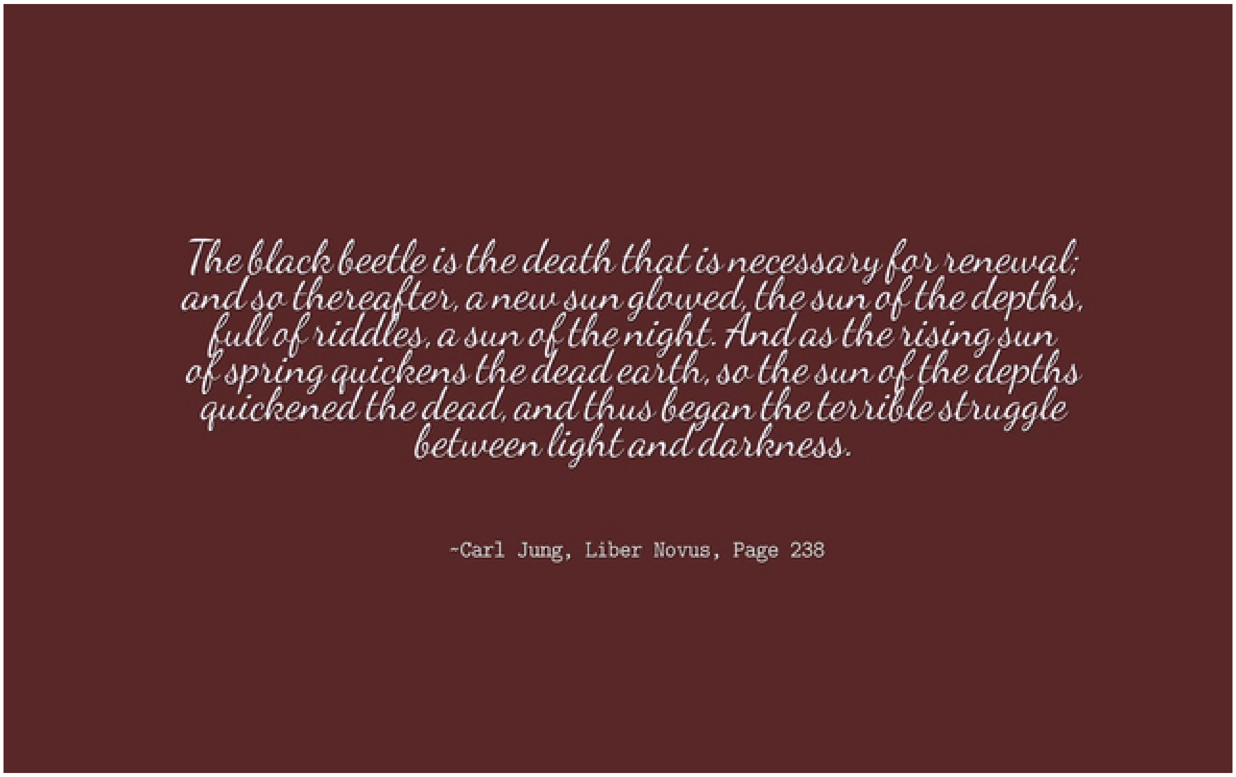
You did not believe it, but you would have known it if you had taken counsel with your fear. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 238.

[8]



The black beetle is the death that is necessary for renewal; and so thereafter, a new sun glowed, the sun of the depths, full of riddles, a sun of the night. And as the rising sun of spring quickens the dead earth, so the sun of the depths quickened the dead, and thus began the terrible struggle between light and darkness.

Jung gave great importance to the papal bull of the Assumptio Maria. He held that it points to the hieros gamos in the pleroma, and this in turn implies, as we have said, the future birth of the divine child, who, in accordance with the divine trend toward incarnation, will choose as his birthplace the empirical man. This metaphysical process is known as the individuation process in the psychology of the unconscious

The advocates of Christianity squander their energies in the mere preservation of what has come down to them... (2019-06-15 03:39)

It is the same problem as in Job. As the highest value and supreme dominant in the psychic hierarchy, the God-image is immediately related to, or identical with, the self, and everything that happens to the God-image has an effect on the latter.
Any uncertainty about the God-image causes a profound uneasiness in the self, for which reason the question is generally ignored because of its painfulness.

But that does not mean that it remains unasked in the unconscious.

What is more, it is answered by views and beliefs like materialism, atheism, and similar substitutes, which spread like epidemics.

They crop up wherever and whenever one waits in vain for the legitimate answer.

The ersatz product represses the real question into the unconscious and destroys the continuity of historical tradition which is the hallmark of civilization.

The result is bewilderment and confusion.

Christianity has insisted on God's goodness as a loving Father and has done its best to rob evil of substance.

The early Christian prophecy concerning the Antichrist, and certain ideas in late Jewish theology, could have suggested to us that the Christian answer to the problem of Job omits to mention the corollary, the sinister reality of which is now being demonstrated before our eyes by the splitting of our world: the destruction of the God-image is followed by the annulment of the human personality.

Materialistic atheism with its Utopian chimeras forms the religion of all those rationalistic movements which delegate the freedom of personality to the masses and thereby extinguish it.

The advocates of Christianity squander their energies in the mere preservation of what has come down to them, with no thought of building on to their house and making it roomier.

Stagnation in these matters is threatened in the long run with a lethal end. Carl Jung; Aion; Page 109; Para 170

In each aeon there are at least a few individuals who understand what man's real task consists of, and keep its tradition for future generations and a time when insight has reached a deeper and more general level.

First the way of a few will be changed and in a few generations there will be more. . .

whoever is capable of such insight, no matter how isolated he is, should be aware of the law of synchronicity.

As the old Chinese saying goes: "The right man sitting in his house and thinking the right thought will be heard a hundred miles away." Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 525.

The consensus of opinion interpreted the Redeemer equally as a fish and a serpent... (2019-06-15 03:45)

[1]

The consensus of opinion interpreted the Redeemer equally as a fish and a serpent; he is a fish because he rose from the unknown depths, and a serpent because he came mysteriously out of the darkness.

Fishes and snakes are favourite symbols for describing psychic happenings or experiences that suddenly dart out of the unconscious and have a frightening or redeeming effect.

That is why they are so often expressed by the motif of helpful animals.

The comparison of Christ with the serpent is more authentic than that with the fish, but, for all that, it was not so popular in primitive Christianity.

The Gnostics favoured it because it was an old-established symbol for the "good" genius loci, the Agathodaimon, and also for their beloved Nous.

Both symbols are of inestimable value when it comes to the natural, instinctive interpretation of the Christ-figure.

Theriomorphic symbols are very common in dreams and other manifestations of the unconscious.

They express the psychic level of the content in question; that is to say, such contents are at a stage of unconsciousness that is as far from human consciousness as the psyche of an animal.

Warm-blooded or cold-blooded vertebrates of all kinds, or even invertebrates, thus indicate the degree of unconsciousness.

It is important for psychopathologists to know this, because these contents can produce, at all levels, symptoms that are localized to the corresponding organic or physiological functions.

For instance, the symptoms may be distinctly correlated with the cerebrospinal and the sympathetic nervous system.

The Sethians may have guessed something of this sort, for Hippolytus mentions, in connection with the serpent, that they compared the "Father" with the cerebrum and the "Son" with the cerebellum and spinal cord.

The snake does in fact symbolize "cold-blooded” inhuman contents and tendencies of an abstractly intellectual as well as a concretely animal nature: in a word, the extra-human quality in man. Carl Jung; Aion; Page 186; Para 292.

Carl Jung two days before his death. (2019-06-15 03:58)

For two days before he died he was away in some far country and he saw wonderful and beautiful things, .I am sure of that.

He smiled often and was happy. . . he told me of the wonderful dream he had had; he said: "Now I know the truth but there is a small piece not filled in and when I know that I shall be dead."

Also after that he had a wonderful dream which he told me in the night.

He saw a huge round block of stone sitting on a high plateau and at the foot of the stone was engraved these words:

"And this shall be a sign unto you of Wholeness and Oneness." Ruth Bailey, Two Friendships, Page 104.

Carl Jung: Don’t think you are forgotten. You would be far from the truth. (2019-06-15 04:06)

My dear Christiana Morgan, 28 December 1927

Don’t think you are forgotten. You would be far from the truth.

First of all you ought to realize that I lived in the happy illusion that I had written to you-presumably because I so often thought of you and I had the intention to ·write to yon so often that eventually I felt as if I had written.

Well you know, it’s all overwork.

There is just too much to do!

Let me thank you most sincerely for your pictures and the text.

I went through the pictures, but not yet through the text. I think your technique has most marvellously improved.

One of your pictures is almost exactly like one of St. Hildegard’s from the early 13th century-I just discovered it. (The one with a naked figure in the centre of the circle.)

This seems to be specifically feminine.

With a man it is nearly always some abstraction; a geometrical figure f.i. that expresses the ultimate form of his essence.

It is probably Logos and Eros, impersonal and personal, which are the most fundamental differences between man and woman.

Your material is most valuable to me.

I often think of working through it, because it seems to me as if it were a most beautiful example of the original initiation process.

In early December your face haunted me for a while.

I should have written then but there was the question of time.

Thank you for everything.

"Don't blame me!" You are always a living reality to me whereas other former patients fade away into oblivion, becoming unreal shadows in Hades.

You are keeping on living.

There seems to be some sort of living connection (but I should have said that long ago I suppose).

You probably need a confirmation from my side of the ocean just as well.

Please do tell Jonah as well as your husband that they are real to me.

If I don't write, it is just that hell of letters and papers and patients.

But my dear(!!) Christiana Morgan, you are just a bit of a marvel to me. Now don't laugh, there is nothing to laugh about.

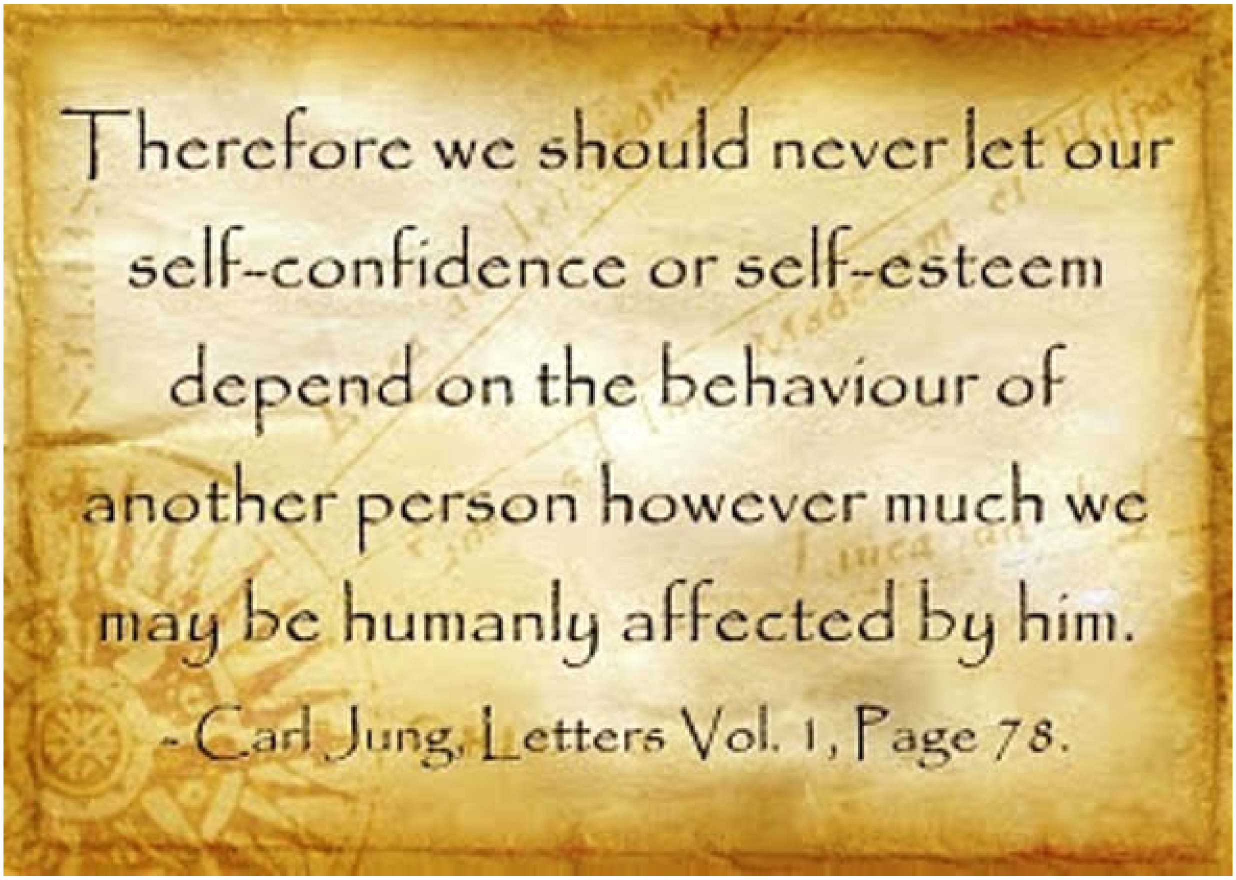
You were quite right in scolding me.

Yours affectionately,

C. G. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 48-49

Carl Jung's Self-Confidence shaken. (2019-06-15 04:10)

[1]



Therefore we should never let our self-confidence or self-esteem depend on the behaviour of another person however much we may be humanly affected by him.

- Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 78.

To you, dear friend. . . for this dawning decade 1960-70, in whose lap the black and white cards of our uncertain fate await us.

The past decade dealt me heavy blows – the death of dear friends and the even more painful loss of my wife, the end of my scientific activity and the burdens of old age, but also all sorts of honors and above all your friendship, which I value the more highly because it appears that men cannot stand me in the long run.

Since I do not deem myself God-almighty enough to have made them other than they are, I must put it down entirely to my own account and lengthen my shadow accordingly.

Your understanding and your interest have done much to restore my self-confidence, severely shaken by my incessant struggle with difficult contemporaries.

It is indeed no trifling thing to be granted the happy proof that somehow one is "possible" and has achieved something whose meaning someone else, apart from myself, is able to see.

Being well-known not to say "famous" means little when one realizes that those who mouth my name have fundamentally no idea of what it’s all about.

The gratification of knowing that one is essentially posthumous is short-lived. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 516.

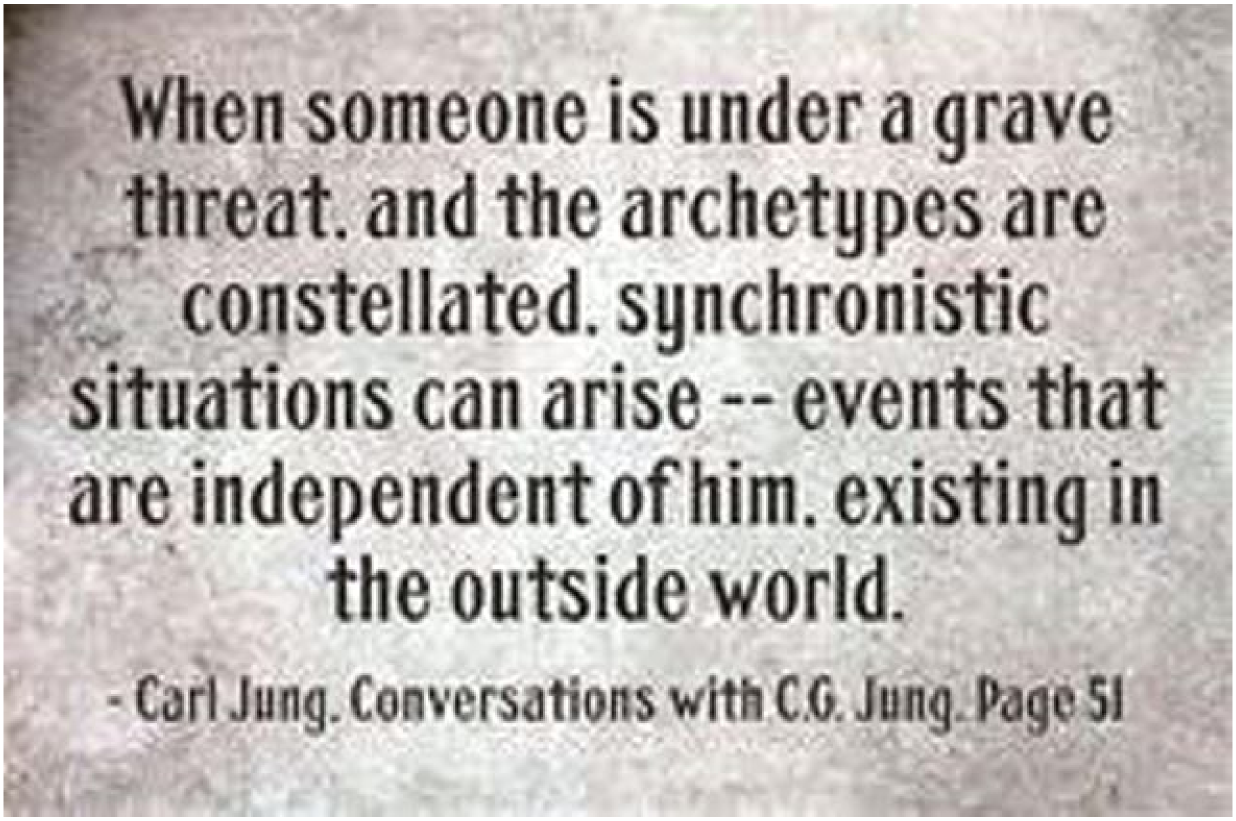
The Death of Carl Jung and “Synchronicity.” (2019-06-15 04:10)

[1]



When someone is under a grave threat. and the archetypes are constellated. synchronistic situations can arise -- events that are independent of him. existing in the outside world.

- Carl Jung. Conversations with C.G. Jung. Page 51

At 4 P.M. on June 6, 1961, Jung died very peacefully, surrounded by his family.

Not surprisingly, synchronicity accompanied his death. Laurens van der Post, on a voyage from Africa to Europe, reported a dream at the time he died of Jung waving goodbye.

Barbara Hannah told how, minutes before his death, she discovered the relatively fresh battery in her car had completely run down.

Nature joined in a couple of hours later with a freak storm over Kusnacht in which lightning struck and scarred the tree where Jung used to sit in the garden. Claire Dunne, Wounded Healer of the Soul, Page 215.

Carl Jung on “Objective” and “Non-Objective” Time. (2019-06-15 15:33)

To Stephen Abrams

Dear Mr. Abrams, 21 October 1957

Your letter leads into the centre of a very complicated problem.

Being a scientist I am rather shy of philosophical operations, particularly of conclusions reaching beyond the limits of experience. F.i. I would not go as far as to say that the categories of space and time are definitely non-objective.

I would rather ask, on which level or in which world are space and time not valid?

In our three-dimensional world they are certainly and inexorably objective, but we have the definite experience that occasionally-presumably under certain conditions-they behave as if they were relatively subjective, that is relatively non-objective.

We are not sure how far the relativity can go, so we do not know whether there is a level or a world on or in which space and time are absolutely abolished; but we remain within the limits of human experience when we accept the fact that it is the psyche which is able to relativize the apparent objectivity of time and space.

This conclusion is fairly safe as we have, to my knowledge, no known reasons to assume that it is the action of time and space which enables the psyche to perform an act of precognition.

They are in our experience, apart f.i. from parapsychology, unchangeable.

However, Einstein’s relativity theory shows that they are not necessarily Identical with our idea of them, f.i. that space may be curved and that time necessarily depends upon the stand-point and the speed of the observer.

Such considerations support the idea of their relative validity.

Parapsychological experience definitely shows their uncertain behaviour under psychic influence.

We conclude therefore that we have to expect a factor in the psyche that is not subject to the laws of time and space, as it is on the contrary capable of suppressing them to a certain extent. In other words: this factor is expected to manifest the qualities of time- and spacelessness, i.e., "eternity" and "ubiquity."

Psychological experience knows of such a factor; it is what I call the archetype, which is ubiquitous in space and time, of course relatively speaking.

It is by the presence of matter in space, thus setting up a gravitational field a structural element of the psyche we find everywhere and at all times; and it is that in which all individual psyches are identical with each other, and where they function as if they were the one undivided Psyche the ancients called anima mundi or the psyche toukosmou.

This is no metaphysical speculation but an observable fact, and therefore the key to innumerable mythologies, that is, to the manifestations of unconscious fantasy.

From this observation it does not follow that this factor is one and the same thing [inside] and outside the psyche, as it were.

It may be, from a psychological point of view, a mere similarity and not a unity in essence.

This question cannot be decided by ordinary psychology, but here Parapsychology comes in, with its psi-phenomena that unmistakably show an essential identity of two separate events, as f.i. the act of prevision and the objective precognized fact.

These experiences show that the factor in question is one and the same inside and outside the psyche.

Or in other words: there is no outside to the collective psyche.

In our ordinary mind we are in the worlds of time and space and within the separate individual psyche.

In the state of the archetype we are in the collective psyche, in a world-system whose space-time categories are relatively or absolutely abolished.

This is about as far as we can go safely.

I see no way beyond, since we are not capable of functioning in a four-dimensional system at will; it only can happen to us.

Our intellectual means reach only as far as archetypal experiences, but within that sphere we are not the motors, we are the moved objects.

Experiment in the ordinary sense therefore becomes impossible.

We can only hope for occasional observations.

From this argument it follows that we should expect an operative archetype.

I have carefully analysed many parapsychological cases and I have been satisfied with the fact that there are indeed operative archetypes in many cases.

I could not say: in all cases, I call them exceptions because they are very curious indeed.

I don’t want to enter into this point here.

I only want to state my general experience: perhaps in most of the cases there is an archetype present, yet there are many other archetypal situations in which no parapsychological phenomenon is observable, and there are also cases of psi-phenomena where no archetypal condition can be demonstrated.

There is no regularity between archetype and synchronistic effect.

The probability of such a relation is presumably the same as that of the Rhine results.

I think you are correct in assuming that synchronicity, though in practice a relatively rare phenomenon, is an all-pervading factor or principle in the universe, i.e., in the Unus Mundus, where there is no incommensurability between so-called matter and so-called psyche.

Here one gets into deep waters, at least I myself must confess that I am far from having sounded these abysmal depths.

In this connection I always come upon the enigma of the natural number.

I have a distinct feeling that Number is a key to the mystery,since it is just as much discovered as it is invented.

It is quantity as well as meaning.

For the latter I refer to the arithmetical qualities of the fundamental archetype of the self (monad, microcosm, etc.) and its historically and empirically well-documented variants of the Four, the 3 + 1 and the 4 – 1.

It seems that I am too old to solve such riddles, but I do hope that a young mind will take up the challenge. It would be worthwhile.

I have already heard some rumours about the foundation of a Parapsychology Club at the University of Chicago.

I accept with pleasure and gratitude the honour of honorary membership.

It is none too early that somebody in the West takes notice of synchronicity.

As I have been informed, the Russians have already caught hold of my paper.

Sincerely yours,

Carl Jung: Here it takes its rightful place as a symbol of individuation. (2019-06-16 03:30)

"Unfortunately I cannot see how I can make conclusively clear to the reader the extraordinarily interesting meaning of this vision."

C.G. Jung
parag.366-7

"I climbed a mountain & came to a place where I saw [a qiadrangle of stones]. I tried to lift the stones nearest me. I discovered the stones were four statues of gods buried upside down in the earth. I dug them up so that I was standing in the middle of them. Suddenly they leaned towards one another until their heads touched. I fell to the ground: 'Fall upon me if you must! I am tired.' I saw beyond, encircling the four gods, a ring of flame had formed. I got up from the ground & overthrew the statues of the gods. Where they fell, four trees shot up. At that blue flames leapt up from the ring of fire & began to burn the foliage of the trees. Seeing this I said, 'This must stop. I must go into the fire myself so that the leaves shall not be burned.' I stepped into the fire. The trees vanished, the fiery ring drew together to one immense blue flame that carried me up from the earth ."

Coming now to our example: it concerns a fantasy of intensely visual character, something which in the language of the ancients would be called a "vision."

Not a "vision seen in a dream," but a vision perceived by intense concentration on the background of consciousness, a technique that is perfected only after long practice.

Told in her own words, this is what the patient saw:

"I climbed the mountain and came to a place where I saw seven red stones in front of me, seven on either side, and seven behind me. I stood in the middle of this quadrangle. The stones were flat like steps. I tried to lift the four stones nearest me. In doing so I discovered that these stones were the pedestals of four statues of gods buried upside down in the earth. I dug them up and arranged them about me so that I was standing in the middle of them. Suddenly they leaned towards one another until their heads touched, forming something like a tent over me. I myself fell to the ground and said, 'Fall upon me if you must! I am tired.' Then I saw that beyond, encircling the four gods, aring of flame had formed. After a time I got up from the ground and overthrew the statues of the gods. Where they fell, four trees shot up. At that blue flames leapt up from the ring offire and began to burn the foliage of the trees. Seeing this I said, 'This must stop. I must go into the fire myself so that the leaves shall not be burned.' Then I stepped into the fire. The trees vanished and the fiery ring drew together to one immense blue flame that carried me up from the earth."

Here the vision ended.

Unfortunately I cannot see how I can make conclusively clear to the reader the extraordinarily interesting meaning of this vision.

The fragment is an excerpt from a long sequence, and one would have to explain everything that happened before and afterwards, in order to grasp the significance of the picture.

At all events the unprejudiced reader will recognize at once the idea of a "mid-point" that is reached by a kind of climb (mountaineering, effort, struggle, etc.).

He will also recognize without difficulty the famous medieval conundrum of the squaring of the circle, which belongs to the field of alchemy.

Here it takes its rightful place as a symbol of individuation.

The total personality is indicated by the four cardinal points, the four gods, i.e., the four functions which give bearings in psychic space, and also by the circle enclosing the whole.

Overcoming the four gods who threaten to smother the individual signifies liberation from identification with the four functions, a fourfold nirdvandva ("free from opposites") followed by an approximation to the circle, to undivided wholeness.

This in its turn leads to further exaltation. Carl Jung, CW 7, 367-368

Carl Jung: Suffering tends to isolate you, (2019-06-16 04:03)

Suffering tends to isolate you.

However, understanding of it may lift you up somewhat In the case of psychological suffering, which always isolates the individual from the herd of so-called normal people, it is of the greatest importance to understand that the conflict is not a personal failure only, but at the same time a suffering common to all and a problem with which the whole epoch is burdened.

This general point of view lifts the individual out of himself and connects him with humanity. Analytical Psychology: Its Theory and Practice: The Tavistock Lectures. (1935). In CW 18 (retitled) "The Tavistock Lectures" P.116

Stiffening and clinging is not all there is to develop throughout life - personality may be developed too.

The nearer we approach to the middle of life, and the better we have succeeded in entrenching ourselves in our personal attitudes and social positions, the more it appears as if we had discovered the right course and the right ideals and principles of behaviour.

For this reason we suppose them to be eternally valid, and make a virtue of unchangeably clinging to them. We overlook the essential fact that the social goal is attained only at the cost of a diminution of personality.

Many - far too many - aspects of life which should also have been experienced lie in the lumber-room among dusty memories; but sometimes, too, they are glowing coals under grey ashes. "The Stages of Life" (1930). In CW 8: The Structure and Dynamics of the Psyche. P. 771

Jewels from the Red Book (2019-06-16 04:06)

Jewels from the Red Book — Quotes

"To the superficial observer, it will appear like madness." Carl Jung

Quotes

While most will not purchase this pricey book, and even less will take the time to plow through the confounding personal revelations of Jung's psychic journey, it is my aim to glean some of the jewels of wisdom that are found in this remarkable journal and make them available for everyone.

As I am reading through the Red Book I have highlighter in hand marking numerous passages I want to remember and share with others who may be curious about this much-talked about publication.

Making a Journal Sacred

"I should advise you to put it all down as beautifully as you can - in some beautifully bound book," Jung instructed. "It will seem as if you were making the visions banal — but then you need to do that — then you are freed from the power of them… Then when these things are in some precious book you can go to the book & turn over the pages & for you it will be your church — your cathedral — the silent places of your spirit where you will find renewal. If anyone tells you that it is morbid or neurotic and you listen to them — then you will lose your soul — for in that book is your soul."
Source: NY Times Magazine article, The Holy Grail of the Unconscious.

Importance of Dreams

I must learn that the dregs of my thought, my dreams, are the speech of my soul. I must carry them in my heart, and go back and forth over them in my mind, like the words of the person dearest to me. Dreams are the guiding words of the soul. Why should I henceforth not love my dreams and not make their riddling images into objects of my daily consideration? 233

The spirit of the depths even taught me to consider my action and my decision as dependent on dreams. Dreams pave the way for life, and they determine you without you understanding their language. One would like to learn this language, but who can teach and learn it? Scholarliness alone is not enough; there is knowledge of the heart that gives deeper insight. The knowledge of the heart is in no book and is not to be found in the mouth of any teacher, but grows out of you like the green seed from the dark earth….But how can I attain the knowledge of the heart? You can attain this knowledge only by living your life to the full. You live your life fully if you also live what you have never lived, but have left for others to live and think. 233

We also live in our dreams; we do not live only by day. Sometimes we accomplish our greatest deeds in dreams. 242

God

If you are boys, your God is a woman.
If you are women, your God is a boy.
If you are men, your God is a maiden.
The God is where you are not. 234
If we set a God outside of ourselves, he tears us loose from the self, since the God is more powerful than we are. Our self falls into privation. But if the God moves into the self, he snatches us from what is outside us. We arrive at singleness in ourselves. 245

I must say that the God could not come into being before the hero had been slain. The hero as we understand him has become an enemy of the God, since the hero is perfection… But the Gods are not with him who wishes to be perfect… 244-45

I understood that the God whom we seek in the absolute was not to be found in absolute beauty, goodness, seriousness, elevation, humanity or even in godliness….I understood that the new God would be in the relative. If the God is absolute beauty and goodness, how should he encompass the fullness of life, which is beautiful and hateful, good and evil, laughable and serious, human and inhuman? How can man live in the womb of the God if the Godhead himself attends only to one-half of them? 243

Everything that becomes too old becomes evil; the same is true of your highest. Learn from the suffering of the crucified God that one can also betray and crucify a God, namely the God of the old year. If a God ceases being the way of life, he must fall secretly. 241

Wholeness

In everything regarding your salvation and the attainment of mercy, you are dependent on your soul. Thus no sacrifice can be too great for you. If your virtues hinder you from salvation, discard them, since they have become evil to you.

The slave to virtue finds the way as little as the slave to vices. 235

Madness

To the extent that the Christianity of this time lacks madness, it lacks divine life. Take note of what the ancients taught us in images: madness is divine. 238

Reality

…mustn’t it be a peculiarly beautiful feeling to hit bottom in reality at least once, where there is no going down any further, but only upward beckons at best? Where for once one stands before the whole height of reality? 265

Importance of Low Point

I therefore need the bottommost for my renewal. If I am always on the heights, I wear them out and the best becomes atrocious to me….At your low point you are no longer distinct from your fellow beings. You are not ashamed and do not regret it, since insofar as you live the life of your fellow beings and descend to their lowliness you also climb into the holy stream of common life, where you are no longer an individual on a high mountain, but a fish among fish, a frog among frogs. 266

Realness of Imaginal Beings

This I learned in the Mysterium: to take seriously every unknown wanderer who personally inhabits the inner world, since they are real because they are effectual. 260

You may call us symbols….But we are just as real as your fellow men. You invalidate nothing and solve nothing by calling us symbols. 249

We are real and not symbols. 246

Living Your Own Life

But one thing you must know: the one thing I have learned is that one must live this life. 232

But how can I attain the knowledge of the heart? You can attain this knowledge only by living your life to the full. You live your life fully if you also live what you have never yet lived, but have left for others to live or to think. 233

But fundamentally you are terrified of yourself, and therefore you prefer to run to all others rather than to yourself. 254

You are Christians and run after heroes, and wait for redeemers who should take the agony on themselves fro you, and totally spare you Golgotha. 254

It is no small matter to acknowledge one's yearning. For this many need to make a particular effort at honesty. All too many do not want to know where their yearning is, because it would seem to them impossible or too distressing. And yet yearning is the way of life. If you do not acknowledge your yearning, then you do not follow yourself, but go on foreign ways that others have indicated to you. So you do not live your life but an alien one. But who should live your life if you do not live it? It is not only stupid to exchange your own life for an alien one, but also a hypocritical game, because you can never really live the life of others, you can only pretend to do it, deceiving the other and yourself, since you can only life your own life. 249

To live oneself means: to be one's own task. Never say that it is a pleasure to live oneself. It will be no joy but a long suffering, since you must become your own creator. If you want to create yourself, then you do not begin with the best and the highest, but with the worst and the deepest. Therefore say that you are reluctant to live yourself. The flowing together of the stream of life is not joy but pain, since it is power against power, guilt, and shatters the sanctified. 249-50

Shadow

If you are aggravated against your brother, think that you are aggravated against the brother in you, that is, against what in you is similar to your brother. 251

He who enters into his own must grope through what lies at hand, he must sense his way from stone to stone. He must embrace the worthless and the worthy with the same love. A mountain is nothing, and a grain of sand holds kingdoms, or also nothing. Judgment must fall from you, even taste, but above all pride, even when it is based on merit. Utterly poor, miserable, unknowingly humiliated, go on through the gate. Turn your anger against yourself, since only you stop yourself from looking and from living. The mystery play is soft like air and thin smoke, and you are raw material that is disturbingly heavy. But let your hope, which is your highest good and highest ability, lead the way and serve you as a guide in the world of darkness… 246-47

Serpent

The serpent is the earthly essence of man of which he is not conscious….it is the mystery that flows to him from the nourishing earth-mother. 247

Man and Woman

You, man, should not seek the feminine in women, but seek and recognize it in yourself, as you… You, woman, should not seek the masculine in men, but assume the masculine in yourself, since you possess it from the beginning. But it amuses you and is easy to play at femininity, consequently man despises you since he despises his femininity…But if you pay attention you will see that the most masculine man has a feminine soul, and the most feminine woman has a masculine soul. The more manly you are the more remote from you is what woman really is, since the feminine in yourself is alien and contemptuous.

But if you remain with yourself, as a man who is himself…then you will remember your humanity. You will not behave toward woman per se as a man, but as a human being, that is to say, as if you were of the same sex as her. You will recall your femininity…It is bitter for the most masculine man to accept his femininity…

You are a slave of what you need in your soul. The most masculine man needs women, and he is consequently their slave. Become a woman yourself, and you will be saved from slavery to woman….It is good for you once to put on women's clothes: people will laugh at you, but through becoming a woman you attain freedom from women and their tyranny. The acceptance of femininity leads to completion. The same is valid for the woman who accepts her masculinity. 263-64

Do you think that somewhere we are not Nature? (2019-06-16 04:18)

"Do you think that somewhere we are not Nature, that we are different from Nature? No, we are in Nature and think exactly like Nature." - C.G. Jung The Earth Has a Soul.

Restoring Nature's Divinity:

"Matter in the wrong place is dirt. People get dirty through too much civilization. Whenever we touch nature, we get clean."

You may not associate such bold, earthy sentiments with Swiss psychiatrist C.G. Jung, but he was, in fact, deeply concerned over the loss of connection with nature. He considered natural life to be the "nourishing soil of the soul." Who has time for a natural life these days? What would it look like if we did? Those of us destined to live through this turbulent period of history, the declining phase of Western civilization, could perhaps use a wise elder who stands slightly outside the modern world yet knows it well enough to offer guidance.

Jung shows the knowledge of an historian who understands how the dissociation from nature came about; he reaches out with the empathy of a healer who shares our plight; and he advises with the common sense of a country doctor how to live "in modest harmony with nature." Jung addresses not only the individual but also our culture as a whole, as an entity that itself is suffering and in need of help.

The title of the book, The Earth Has A Soul, is taken from a 1958 letter in which Jung refers to "the old idea that every country or people has its own angel, just as the earth has a soul." (Letters II, p432) We find that Jung uses the words soul, spirit and psyche somewhat interchangeably. "Psyche" is Greek for soul, life, and breath; so psyche is Nature itself. In the Visions Seminars that he gave in the early 1930s, Jung remarked that "the earth has a spirit of her own, a beauty of her own." (Interpretation of Visions, pp133-4) Spirit is the inside of things and matter is their visible outer aspect. Jung's main contribution is restoring to Nature its original wholeness by reminding us that "nature is not matter only, she is also spirit." (Collected Works,13, par 229) A brief anecdote illustrates Jung's apperception of the living spirit within Nature:

"I once experienced a violent earthquake, and my first, immediate feeling was that I no longer stood on solid familiar earth, but on the skin of a gigantic animal that was heaving under my feet. It was this image that impressed itself on me, not the physical fact." (Collected Works,8, par 331)

Historical eras oscillate between an orientation toward matter or spirit. We are living in a period when the material aspect of Nature is emphasized; it is often said that we are materialistic. But this is not quite the case, since matter actually receives very little respect due to its having been robbed, as Jung notes, of its spirit -

"The word 'matter' remains a dry, inhuman, and purely intellectual concept… How different was the former image of matter—the Great Mother—that could encompass and express the profound emotional meaning of the Great Mother."(Man & His Symbols, pp94-5)

In a 1923 seminar, Jung identified four elements that have undergone the most severe repression in the Judeo-Christian world: nature, animals, creative fantasy, and the "inferior" or primitive side of humans, which tends to be mistakenly conflated with instinct or sexuality.

"It is a general truth that the earth is depreciated and misunderstood…For quite long enough we have been taught that this life is not the real thing…and that we live only for heaven." (Interpretation of Visions, p193)

Our loss of connection with Nature is thus neither a practical nor a psychological problem but a religious one, as this statement by Joseph Henderson emphasizes:

"Nature has lost her divinity, yet the spirit is unsure and unsatisfied. Hence any true cure for the neurosis…would have to awaken both spirit and nature to a new life. The relevance of this theme for us today may be that it is a problem we are still trying to solve on too personal, psychological a level, or on a purely cultural level without fully realizing it is at bottom a religious problem and not psychological or social at all." (Henderson, Shadow and Self, p279)

Jung grew up (b.1875) in conditions largely unchanged since the Middle Ages and lived to see the emergence of the techno-industrial age (d.1961)… Although there are others today who offer clarity about how our ruptured relationship with Nature could be repaired, I believe that only Jung speaks in both the discursive voice of a modern doctor who is able to explain, and the mythic or poetic voice of a tribal healer, who is able to enchant. By incorporating wisdom from the depths of the psyche, Jung reaches not only our modern mind but also the aspect of our being that he termed archaic, natural, primordial, or original.

This unusual capacity to span both the archaic and the modern arose from his actual background with its deep roots in his ancestral lineage and certain significant experiences such as his seminal dream at age 34 about our species' phylogenetic history. It concerned a multi-storied house in which the furnishings and construction style of each level represented different historical periods. The top floor was the present, the level below the 16th century, the first floor below ground the Roman era, and in the deepest level was a dusty cave containing bones, shards and tools from a neolithic culture. He came to view the dream as an objective picture not only of European history but of the historic composition of the human psyche, the stories signifying successive layers of consciousness. This interior opening… provided Jung with access to the various stages of consciousness, including what he came to call "the primitive within myself".

Carl Jung: If a man knows more than others, he becomes lonely. (2019-06-16 05:14)

The difference between most people and myself is that for me the "dividing walls" are transparent.

That is my peculiarity.

Others find these walls so opaque that they see nothing behind them and therefore think nothing is there.

To some extent I perceive the processes going on in the background, and that gives me an inner certainty.

People who see nothing have no certainties and can draw no conclusions–or do not trust them even if they do.

I do not know what started me off perceiving the stream of life. Probably the unconscious itself. Or perhaps my early dreams.

They determined my course from the beginning.

Knowledge of processes in the background early shaped my relationship to the world.

Basically, that relationship was the same in my childhood as it is to this day.

As a child I felt myself to be alone, and I am still, because I know things and must hint at things which others apparently know nothing of, and for the most part do not want to know.

Loneliness does not come from having no people about one, but from being unable to communicate the things that seem important to oneself, or from holding certain views which others find inadmissible.

The loneliness began with the experiences of my early dreams, and reached its climax at the time I was working on the unconscious.

If a man knows more than others, he becomes lonely.

But loneliness is not necessarily inimical to companionship, for no one is more sensitive to companionship than the lonely man, and companionship thrives only when each individual remembers his individuality and does not identify himself with others. Carl Jung, MDR, Pages 355-356

Carl Jung on "Meaning" in The Red Book - Anthology (2019-06-16 07:07)

My soul is my supreme meaning, my image of God.

Carl Jung
Red Book

William Blake: Book of Urizen
www.jungcurrents.com

If you marry the ordered to the chaos, you produce the divine child, the supreme meaning beyond meaning and meaninglessness. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 235

One needs death to be able to harvest the fruit. Without death, life would be meaningless, since the long-lasting rises again and denies its own meaning. To be, and to enjoy your being, you need death, and limitation enables you to fulfill your being. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 275.

The meanings that follow one another do not lie in things, but lie in you, who are subject to many changes, insofar as you take part in life. Things also change, but you do not notice this if you do not change. But if you change, the countenance of the world alters. The manifold sense of things is your manifold sense. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 273.

The symbol becomes my lord and unfailing commander. It will fortify its reign and change itself into a starry and riddling image, whose meaning turns completely inward, and whose pleasure radiates outward like blazing fire, a Buddha in the flames. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 249.

If forethinking and pleasure unite in me, a third arises from them, the divine son, who is the supreme meaning, the symbol, the passing over into a new creation. I do not myself become the supreme meaning or the symbol, but the symbol becomes in me such that it has its substance, and I mine. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 249.

Day does not exist through itself, night does not exist through itself. The reality that exists through itself is day and night. So the reality is meaning and absurdity. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 242.

My soul is my supreme meaning, my image of God, neither God himself nor the supreme meaning. God becomes apparent in the supreme meaning of the human community. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Footnote 92, Page 240.

lent John the word so that John would have at his disposal the word ’Logos’ alongside the word ’light’ to describe the son of man. John gave to living men the meaning of the Logos, but Philo gave Logos as the dead concept that usurped life, even the divine life. Through this the dead does not gain life, and the living is killed. And this was also my atrocious error." Ammonius to Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 269.

The other Gods died of their temporality, yet the supreme meaning never dies, it turns into meaning and then into absurdity, and out of the fire and blood of their collision the supreme meaning rises up rejuvenated anew. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 230.

The image of God has a shadow. The supreme meaning is real and casts a shadow. For what can be actual and corporeal and have no shadow? Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 230.

This meaning of events is the supreme meaning, that is not in events, and not in the soul, but is the God standing between events and the soul, the mediator of life, the way, the bridge and the going across. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 239.

My thoughts are not my self but exactly like the things of the world, alive and dead. Just as I am not damaged through living in a partly chaotic world, so too I am not damaged if I live in my partly chaotic thought world. Thoughts are natural events that you do not possess, and whose meaning you only imperfectly recognize. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 250.

I must free my self from the God, since the God I experienced is more than love; he is also hate, he is more than beauty, he is also the abomination, he is more than wisdom, he is also meaninglessness, he is more than power, he is also powerlessness, he is more than omnipresence, he is also my creature. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 339.

The spirit of this time would like to hear of use and value. I also thought this way, and my humanity still thinks this way. But that other spirit forces me nevertheless to speak, beyond justification, use, and meaning. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 229

The solitary went into the desert to find himself. But he did not want to find himself but rather the manifold meaning of holy scripture. You can suck the immensity of the small and the great into yourself and you will become emptier and emptier, since immense fullness and immense emptiness are one and the same. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 273.

The spirit of the depths took my understanding and all my knowledge and placed them at the service of the inexplicable and the paradoxical. He robbed me of speech and writing for everything that was not in his service, namely the melting together of sense and nonsense, which produces the supreme meaning. Carl Jung; The Red Book, Page 229

There are not too many truths, there are only a few. Their meaning is too deep to grasp other than in symbols. Carl Jung, The Red Book, p. 291.

Events signify nothing, they signify only in us. We create the meaning of events. The meaning is and always was artificial. We make it. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 239.

Notice what the ancients said in images: the word is a creative act. The ancients said: in the beginning was the Word. Consider this and think upon it. The words that oscillate between nonsense and supreme meaning are the oldest and truest. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 236.

The meaning of events is the way of salvation that you create. The meaning of events comes from the possibility of life in this world that you create. It is the mastery of this world and the assertion of your soul in this world. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 239.

Disorder and meaninglessness are the mother of order and meaning. Order and meaning are things that have become and are no longer becoming. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 235.

But the supreme meaning is the path the way and the bridge to what is to come. That is the God yet to come. It is not the coming God himself but his image which appears in the supreme meaning. God is an image, and those who worship him must worship him in the images of the supreme meaning. The supreme meaning is not a meaning and not an absurdity, it is image and force in one, magnificence and force together. The supreme meaning is the beginning and the end. It is the bridge of going across and fulfillment. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Pages 229-230.

There is no reason why whole numbers possess certain meanings or qualities, and no reason why elephants or men should exist. These arrangements are simply there as given facts, like the crystalline systems or the discontinuities of physics, even as the whole of creation is a "just-so story." Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 355.

Carl Jung: I had no idea of the mishap that has befallen your son. (2019-06-16 07:55)

Dear Professor Freud, 31 January 1911

Many thanks for all the news in you last letter. - As I am laid low with influenza, this will be only a soulless typed letter."

Stekel's aphorisms are atrocious.

A blessing they were suppressed - The real reason for my writing to you in haste and so disjointedly, and sending the letter by a third hand, is to introduce a friend from my student days at Basel University, a surgeon-.

He is an amiable fellow with a laudable if limited interest in psychoanalysis.

He won't make a nuisance of himself in any way, only wants to take a modest seat in the Vienna Society and learn a thing or two.

The name is Dr. Achilles Muiller.

I had no idea of the mishap that has befallen your son.

In the circumstances it is a miracle that he got off so lightly.

These accidents are terribly dangerous. - My wife and I send heartfelt wishes for speedy recovery.

Best regards and wishes for your own health,

Most sincerely yours,

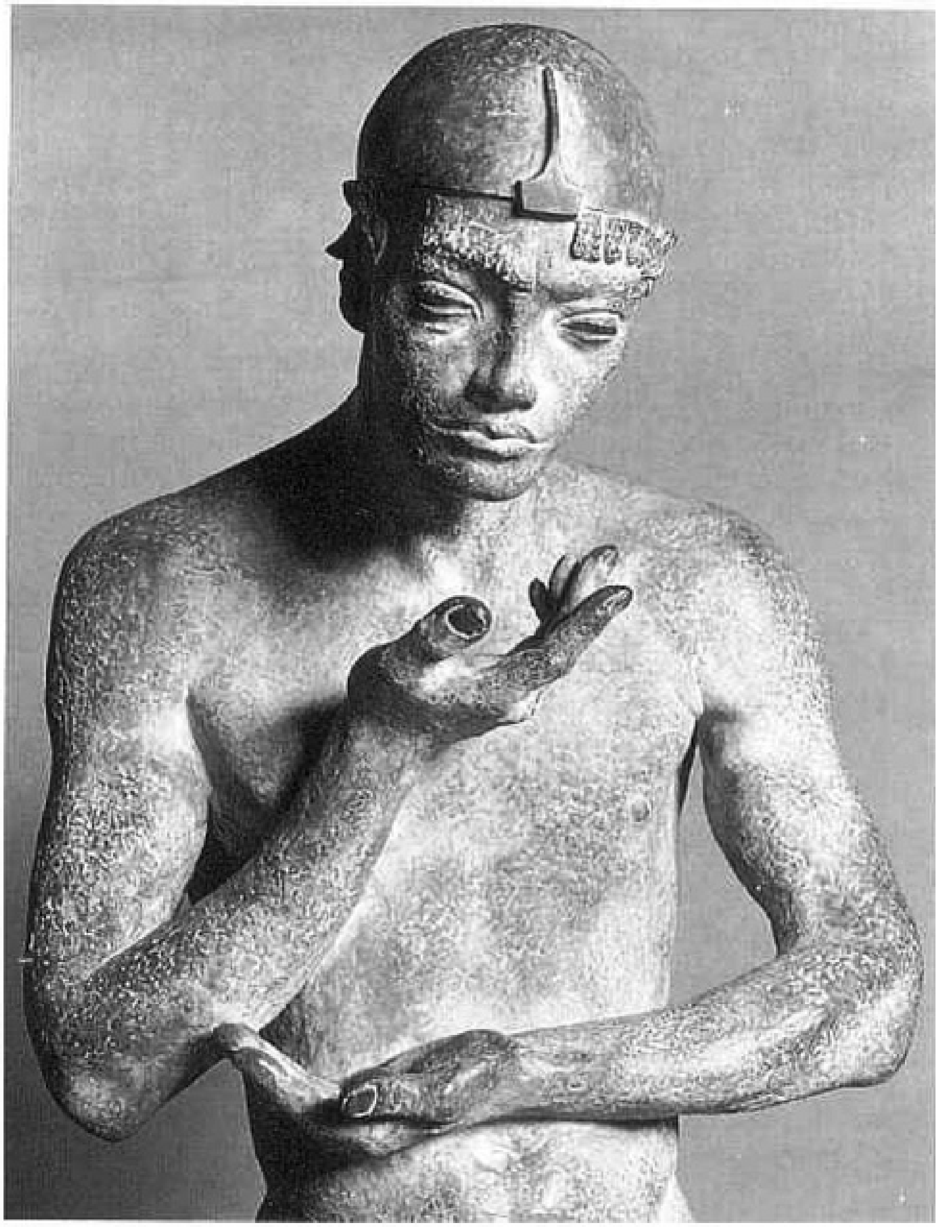
The last time Mary Crile visited Dr. Jung. (2019-06-16 08:37)



Artist Mary Crile visited Jung in that period.

The last time I saw Jung face to face. . .

I found him much aged but there was the same kindly twinkle behind those penetrating eyes of his.

When he said, "Pull up your chair, for I am getting deaf and old and stupid," I could not help smiling as I reminded him that he had made exactly the same remark to me, just eleven years earlier.

He replied with a chuckle "Well, it doesn’t seem to get any better.". . .

When I asked him what he was writing he said, "My biography. . . .

It is purgatory. Frau Jaffe is writing it but I must check it all because no one knows someone else’s life.

I have done the first twenty years because one can be more objective there."

He paused and then added thoughtfully, "I don't know the meaning of .life."

As he said this I felt that, even for Jung, who more than anyone else in our day saw life steadily and saw it whole, there still remained an unsolved mystery. Mary Crile,Wounded Healer of the Soul, Pages 194-195.

Carl Jung: If only one did not have a scientific conscience and that hankering after the truth. (2019-06-16 11:18)

VOLUME 1 OF THE COLLECTED WORKS OF
C. G. JUNG
FREUD
AND PSYCHOANALYSIS
BOLLINGEN SERIES XX
PANTHEON

From Dr. Loy 12 January 1913

What you said at our last interview was extraordinarily stimulating.

I was expecting you to throw light on the interpretation of my own and my patients' dreams from the standpoint of Freud's dream interpretation.

Instead, you put before me an entirely new conception: the dream as a means, produced by the subconscious, of restoring the moral balance.

That is certainly a fruitful thought.

But still more fruitful, it seems to me, is your other suggestion.

You conceive the tasks of psychoanalysis to be much deeper than I had ever imagined: it is no longer a question of getting rid of troublesome pathological symptoms, but of the analysand learning to know himself completely—not just his anxiety experiences—and on the basis of this knowledge building up and shaping his life anew.

But he himself must be the builder; the analyst only furnishes him with the necessary tools.

To begin with, I would ask you to consider what justification there is for the original procedure of Breuer and Freud, now entirely given up both by Freud himself and by you, but practised by Frank, for instance, as his only method: the "abreaction of inhibited affects under light hypnosis."

Why did you give up the cathartic method? Please explain.

More particularly, has light hypnosis in psycho-catharsis a different value from suggestion during sleep, long practised in suggestion therapy?

That is, has it only the value which the doctor attributes, or says he attributes to it, the value which the patient’s faith gives it?

In other words, is suggestion in the waking state equivalent to suggestion in the hypnoid state, as Bernheim now asserts, after having used suggestion for many years in hypnosis?

You will tell me that we must talk of psychoanalysis, not of suggestion.

What I really mean is this: is not the suggestion that psychocatharsis in the hypnoid state will produce a therapeutic effect (with limitations, naturally, the age of the patient, etc.) the main factor in the therapeutic effects of psychocatharsis?

Frank says in his Affektstorungen: "These one-sided attitudes, suggestibility and suggestion, are almost entirely in abeyance in psychocatharsis under light sleep, so far as the content of the ideas reproduced is concerned." Is that really true?

Frank himself adds: "How can ruminating on the dreams of youth in itself lead to discharge of the stored-up anxiety, whether in the hypnoid state or any other?

Must we not rather suppose that ruminating on them would make the anxiety states even greater?" (I have noticed this myself, far more than I liked.) Of course one says to the patient, "First we must stir up, then afterwards comes peace." And it does come.

But does it not come in spite of the stirring-up process, because gradually, by means of frequent talks apart from light hypnosis, the patient gains such confidence in the analyst that he becomes susceptible to the direct suggestion that an improvement and then a cure will follow?

I go still further: in an analysis in the waking state, is not the patient’s faith that the method employed will cure him, coupled with his growing confidence in the analyst, a main cause of his cure?

And I go still further: in every therapeutic method systematically carried out is not faith in it, confidence in the doctor, a main cause of its success?

I won’t say the only cause, for one cannot deny that physical, dietetic, and chemical procedures, when properly selected, have their own effect in bringing about a cure, over and above the striking effects produced by indirect suggestion.

From Dr. Jung 28 January 1913

With regard to your question concerning the applicability of the cathartic procedure, I can say that I adopt the following standpoint: every procedure is good if it helps.

I therefore acknowledge every method of suggestion including Christian Science, mental healing, etc. "A truth is a truth, when it works."

It is another question, though, whether a scientifically trained doctor can square it with his conscience to sell little bottles of Lourdes water because this suggestion is at times very helpful.

Even the so-called highly scientific suggestion therapy employs the wares of the medicine-man and the exorcising shaman.

And why not?

The public is not much more advanced either and continues to expect miraculous cures from the doctor.

And indeed, we must rate those doctors wise—worldly-wise in every sense—who know how to surround themselves with the aura of a medicine-man.

They have not only the biggest practices but also get the best results.

This is because, apart from the neuroses, countless physical illnesses are tainted and complicated with psychic material to an unsuspected degree.

The medical exorcist betrays by his whole demeanour his full appreciation of that psychic component when he gives the patient the opportunity of fixing his faith firmly on the mysterious personality of the doctor.

In this way he wins the sick man’s mind, which from then on helps him to restore his body to health.

The cure works best when the doctor himself believes in his own formulae, otherwise he may be overcome by scientific doubt and so lose the proper convincing tone.

I myself practised hypnotic suggestion therapy for a time with enthusiasm.

But then there befell me three dubious incidents which I would like to bring to your attention.

One day a withered old peasant woman of about 56 came to me to be hypnotized for various neurotic troubles.

She was not easy to hypnotize, was very restless, and kept opening her eyes —but at last I did succeed.

When I woke her up again after about half an hour she seized my hand and with many words testified to her overflowing gratitude.

I told her, "You are by no means cured yet, so keep your thanks till the end of the treatment."

"I’m not thanking you for that," she whispered, blushing, "but because you were so decent." She looked at me with a sort of tender admiration and departed.

I gazed for a long time at the spot where she had stood. So decent?

I asked myself, flabbergasted—good heavens, surely she hadn’t imagined . . . ?

This glimpse made me suspect for the first time that possibly the old reprobate, with the atrocious directness of feminine (at the time I called it "animal") instinct, understood more about the essence of hypnosis than I did with all my knowledge of the scientific profundity of the text-books.

My innocence was gone. Next came a pretty, coquettish, seventeen-year-old girl with a very harassed-looking mama.

She had suffered since early childhood from enuresis nocturna (which she used, among other things, to stop herself being sent to a finishing school in Italy).

At once I thought of the old woman and her wisdom.

I tried to hypnotize the girl; she went into fits of laughter and held up the hypnosis for twenty minutes.

I kept my temper and thought: I know why you laugh, you have already fallen in love with me, but I will give you proof of my decency as a reward for wasting my time with your provocative laughter.

At last I put her under. The effect was immediate.

The enuresis stopped, and I thereupon informed the young lady that, instead of Wednesday, I would not see her again for hypnosis till the following Saturday.

On Saturday she arrived with a cross face, boding disaster. The enuresis had come back again.

I thought of my wise old woman and asked, "When did it come back?" She (unsuspecting): "Wednesday night."

I thought to myself: There we have it, she wants to prove to me that I absolutely must see her on Wednesdays too; not to see me for a whole long week is too much for a tender loving heart.

But I did not intend to pander to this annoying romance, so I said, "It would be quite wrong to continue the treatment under these circumstances.

We must drop it altogether for three weeks, to give the enuresis a chance to stop.

Then come again for treatment."

In my malicious heart I knew that I would be away on holiday and the course for hypnotic treatment would be finished.

After the holiday my locum tenens told me that the young lady had been there with the news that the enuresis had vanished, but her disappointment at not seeing me was very keen.

The old woman was right, I thought.

The third case gave my joy in suggestion therapy its deathblow.

This case really was the limit.

A 65-year-old lady came hobbling into the consulting-room on a crutch.

She had suffered from pain in the knee-joint for seventeen years, and this at times kept her chained to her bed for many weeks.

No doctor had been able to cure her, and she had run through all the cures of present-day medicine.

After letting the stream of her narrative pour over me for ten minutes, I said, "I will try to hypnotize you, perhaps that will do you good."

"Oh yes, please do!" she said, then leaned her head to one side and fell asleep before ever I said or did a thing.

She passed into somnambulism and showed every form of hypnosis you could possibly desire.

After half an hour I had the greatest difficulty in waking her; when at last she was awake she jumped up: "I am well, I am all right, you have cured me!"

I tried to raise timid objections, but her praises drowned me.

She could really walk. I blushed, and said embarrassed to my colleagues: "Behold the marvels of hypnotic therapy!"

That day saw the death of my connection with therapy by suggestion; the notoriety aroused by this case shamed and depressed me.

When, a year later, the good old lady returned, this time with a pain in her back, I was already sunk in hopeless cynicism; I saw written on her brow that she had just read in the paper the notice of the reopening of my course on hypnotism.

That tiresome romanticism had provided her with a convenient pain in the back so that she might have a pretext for seeing me, and again let herself be cured in the same spectacular fashion.

This proved true in every particular.

As you will understand, a man possessed of a scientific conscience cannot digest such cases with impunity.

I was resolved to abandon suggestion altogether rather than allow myself to be passively transformed into a miracle-worker.

I wanted to understand what really goes on in people's minds.

It suddenly seemed to me incredibly childish to think of dispelling an illness with magical incantations, and that this should be the sole result of our efforts to create a psychotherapy.

Thus the discovery of Breuer and Freud came as a veritable life-saver.

I took up their method with unalloyed enthusiasm and soon recognized how right Freud was when, at a very early date, indeed as far back as Studies on Hysteria, he began to direct a searchlight on the circumstances of the so-called trauma.

I soon discovered that, though traumata of clearly aetiological significance were occasionally present, the majority of them appeared very improbable.

Many traumata were so unimportant, even so normal, that they could be regarded at most as a pretext for the neurosis.

But what especially aroused my criticism was the fact that not a few traumata were simply inventions of fantasy and had never happened at all.

This realization was enough to make me skeptical about the whole trauma theory. (I have discussed these matters in detail in my lectures on the theory of psychoanalysis.)

I could no longer imagine that repeated experiences of a fantastically exaggerated or entirely fictitious trauma had a different therapeutic value from a suggestion procedure.

It is good if it helps.

If only one did not have a scientific conscience and that hankering after the truth!

I recognized in many cases, particularly with intelligent patients, the therapeutic limitations of this method.

It is merely a rule of thumb, convenient for the analyst because it makes no particular demands on his intellect or his capacity to adapt.

The theory and practice are delightfully simple: "The neurosis comes from a trauma. The trauma is abreacted."

If the abreacting takes place under hypnotism or with other magical accessories (dark room, special lighting, etc.), I think at once of my clever old woman, who opened my eyes not only to the magical influence of the mesmeric passes but to the nature of hypnotism itself.

What alienated me once and for all from this comparatively effective, indirect method of suggestion, based as it is on an equally effective false theory, was the simultaneous recognition that behind the bewildering and deceptive maze of neurotic fantasies there is a conflict which may best be described as a moral one.

With this there began for me a new era of understanding.

Research and therapy now joined hands in the effort to discover the causes and the rational solution of the conflict.

For me this meant psychoanalysis.

While I was arriving at this insight, Freud had built up his sexual theory of neurosis, thus posing a mass of questions for discussion, all of which seemed worthy of the deepest consideration.

I had the good fortune to collaborate with Freud for a long time, and to work with him on the problem of sexuality in neurosis.

You know perhaps from some of my earlier works that I was always rather dubious about the significance of sexuality.

This has now become the point on which I am no longer altogether of Freud's opinion.

I have preferred to answer your questions in a somewhat inconsequential fashion.

I will now catch up on the rest: light hypnosis and total hypnosis are simply varying degrees of intensity of unconscious susceptibility to the hypnotist.

Who can draw sharp distinctions here?

To a critical intelligence it is unthinkable that suggestibility and suggestion can be avoided in the cathartic method.

They are present everywhere as general human attributes, even with Dubois and the psychoanalysts, who all think they are working on purely rational lines.

No technique and no self-effacement avails here; the analyst works willy-nilly, and perhaps most of all, through his personality, i.e., through suggestion.

In the cathartic method, what is of far more importance to the patient than the conjuring up of old fantasies is the experience of being together so often with the analyst, his trust and belief in him personally and in his method.

The belief, the self-confidence, perhaps also the devotion with which the analyst does his work, are far more important to the patient (imponderabilia though they may be) than the rehearsing of old traumata.

It is time we learnt from the history of medicine everything that has ever been of help, then perhaps we shall discover the really necessary therapy—that is, psychotherapy.

Did not even the old apothecaries' messes achieve brilliant cures, cures which faded only with the belief in their efficacy?!

Because I know that, despite all rational safeguards, the patient does attempt to assimilate the analyst's personality, I have laid it down as a requirement that the psychotherapist must be just as responsible for the cleanness of his hands as the surgeon.

I even hold it to be an indispensable prerequisite that the psychoanalyst should first submit himself to the analytical process, as his personality is one of the main factors in the cure.

Patents read the analyst's character intuitively, and they should find in him a man with failings, admittedly, but also a man who strives at every point to fulfil his human duties in the fullest sense.

Many times I have had the opportunity of seeing that the analyst is successful with his treatment just so far as he has succeeded in his own moral development.

I think this answer will satisfy your question. Loy/Jung Letters, CW 4, Pages 253-260

Carl Jung on "Pipes" - Anthology (2019-06-16 11:53)

Until now I have smoked 1 pipe with water condensation on beginning work in the morning, a miniature cigar after lunch, equal to 1-2 cigarettes, another pipe at 4 o'clock, after supper another little cigar, and generally another pipe about 9:30. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 103.

For a time I faithfully observed the rigorous rules of abstinence until my impatience drove me again to a few pipes . Of the 2 evils the pipe seems to me the lesser. Everything went very well from the moment I gave up the digitalis . . Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 105

Although I have never made a statistique of this kind I have always been impressed by the fact that pipe-smokers are usually introverted. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 564-565

The typical extravert is too much of a busybody to bother and fuss with the pipe which demands infinitely more nursing than a cigarette that can be lighted or thrown away in a second.   Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages, 564-565

That does not prevent me from having found heavy cigarette-smokers among my introverts and not a few pipe-smokers among the extraverts, but normally with empty pipes. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 564-565

FRANCES G. WICKES
INTRODUCTION BY C. G. JUNG

Letter sent by Carl Jung to Frances G. Wickes August 27, 1926

My dear Mrs. Wickes,

It is too terrible. Was there anything wrong with the thymus gland?

Thre might be a reason for such a sudden death in youth. Anyhow he did not know that he died. He vanished at the moment of joy. But what a loss to you! I wish I could hold your hand and tell you haw deeply I feel with you.

Yours affectionately,

C.G. Jung

Note: Mrs Wickes only son Eliphalet, 21, had died while sailing on the coast of Maine. It was supposed that he had either had a heart attack or been struck by the boom of the sailboat.

Observance of customs and laws can very easily be a cloak for a lie so subtle that our fellow human beings are unable to detect it. It may help us to escape all criticism, we may even be able to deceive ourselves in the belief of our obvious righteousness. But deep down, below the surface of the average man's conscience, he hears a voice whispering, "There is something not right," no matter how much his rightness is supported by public opinion or by the moral code. Carl G. Jung, in the introduction to Frances G. Wickes' "Analysis der Kinderseele" (The Inner World of Childhood), 1931

Jung’s Premonitions of World War I

Dreamed 1913-1914 by Carl Jung

This account is from Jung’s autobiography Memories, Dreams, Reflections.

In October [1913], while I was alone on a journey, I was suddenly seized by an overpowering vision: I saw a monstrous flood covering all the northern and low-lying lands between the North Sea and the Alps.

When it came up to Switzerland I saw that the mountains grew higher and higher to protect our country.

I realized that a frightful catastrophe was in progress.

I saw the mighty yellow waves, the floating rubble of civilization, and the drowned bodies of uncounted thousands.

Then the whole sea turned to blood.

This vision last about one hour.

I was perplexed and nauseated, and ashamed of my weakness.

Two weeks passed; then the vision recurred, under the same conditions, even more vividly than before, and the blood was more emphasized.

An inner voice spoke. "Look at it well; it is wholly real and it will be so. You cannot doubt it."

That winter someone asked me what I thought were the political prospects of the world in the near future.

I replied that I had no thoughts on the matter, but that I saw rivers of blood.

I asked myself whether these visions pointed to a revolution, but could not really imagine anything of the sort.

And so I drew the conclusion that they had to do with me myself, and decided that I was menaced by a psychosis.

The idea of war did not occur to me at all.

Soon afterward, in the spring and early summer of 1914, I had a thrice-repeated dream that in the middle of summer an Arctic cold wave descended and froze the land to ice.

I saw, for example, the whole of Lorraine and its canals frozen and the entire region totally deserted by human beings.

All living green things were killed by frost.

This dream came in April and May, and for the last time in June, 1914.

In the third dream frightful cold had again descended from out of the cosmos.

This dream, however, had an unexpected end. There stood a leaf-bearing tree, but without fruit (my tree of life, I thought), whose leaves had been transformed by the effects of the frost into sweet grapes full of healing juices.

I plucked the grapes and gave them to a large, waiting crowd…

On August 1 the world war broke out.

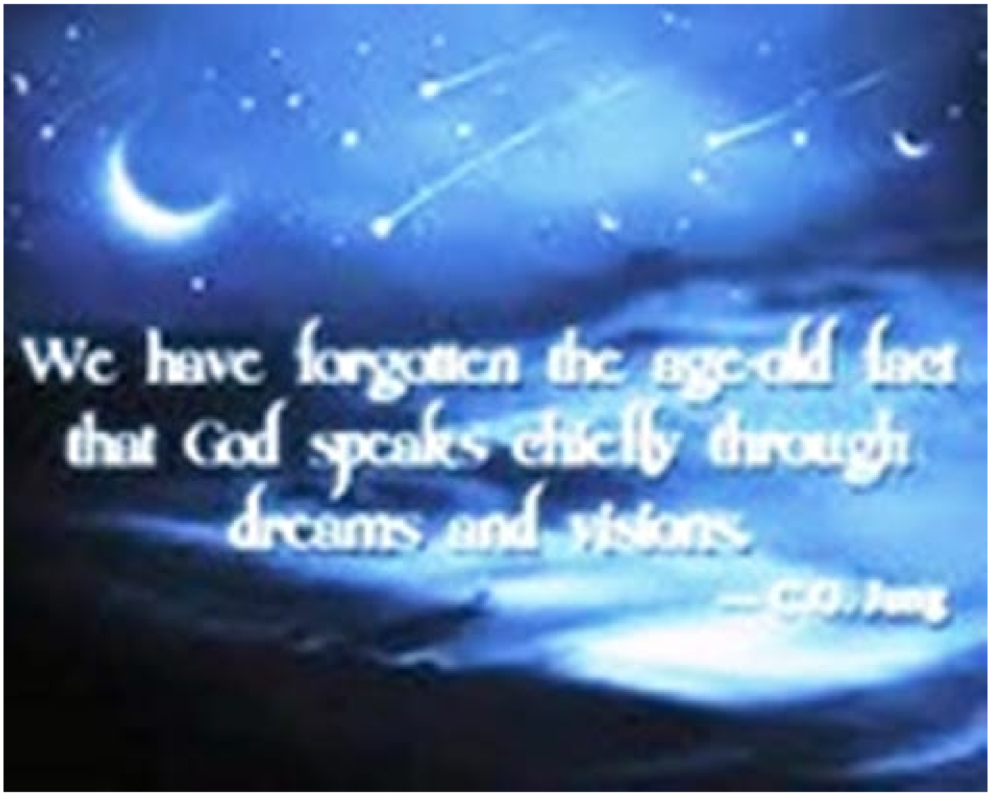
Carl Jung on “God,” “Gods.” - Anthology (2019-06-17 05:00)

[1]



We have forgotten the age-old fact that God speaks chiefly through dreams and visions.
—C.G. Jung

For a woman, the typical danger emanating from the unconscious comes from above, from the “spiritual” sphere personified by the animus, whereas for a man it comes from the chthonic realm of the “world and woman,” i.e., the anima projected on to the world. Carl Jung, CW 9i, Para 559

One of the essential features of the child motif is its futurity.

The child is potential future.

Hence the occurrence of the child motif in the psychology of the individual signifies as a rule an anticipation of future developments, even though at first sight it may seem like a retrospective configuration.

Life is a flux, a flowing into the future, and not a stoppage or a backwash.

It is therefore not surprising that so many of the mythological saviours are child gods.

This agrees exactly with our experience of the psychology of the individual, which shows that the “child” paves the way for a future change of personality.

This it cannot do without detaching itself from its origins: abandonment is therefore a necessary condition, not just a concomitant symptom. Carl Jung, CW 9i, Para 287

If we go further and consider the fact that man is also what neither he himself nor other people know of him—an unknown something which can yet be proved to exist —the problem of identity becomes more difficult still.

Indeed, it is quite impossible to define the extent and the ultimate character of psychic existence.

When we now speak of man we mean the indefinable whole of him, an ineffable totality, which can only be formulated symbolically.

I have chosen the term “self” to designate the totality of man, the sum total of his conscious and unconscious contents.

I have chosen this term in accordance with Eastern philosophy, which for centuries has occupied itself with the problems that arise when even the gods cease to incarnate. Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 140

When Nietzsche said “God is dead,” he uttered a truth which is valid for the greater part of Europe.

People were influenced by it not because he said so, but because it stated a widespread psychological fact.

The consequences were not long delayed: after the fog of–isms, the catastrophe.

Nobody thought of drawing the slightest conclusions from Nietzsche’s pronouncement.

Yet it [Nietzche’s “God is Dead”] has, for some ears, the same eerie sound as that ancient cry which came echoing over the sea to mark the end of the nature gods: “Great Pan is dead.” Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 145.

All opposites are of God, therefore man must bend to this burden; and in so doing he finds that God in his “oppositeness” has taken possession of him, incarnated himself in him.

He becomes a vessel filled with divine conflict. Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 659

It is quite right, therefore, that fear of God should be considered the beginning of all wisdom.

On the other hand, the much-vaunted goodness, love, and justice of God should not be regarded as mere propitiation, but should be recognized as genuine experience, for God is a coincidentia oppositorum [unity of the opposites].

Both are justified, the fear of God as well as the love of God. Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 664.

Man is not so much delivered from his sins, even if he is baptized in the prescribed manner and thus washed clean, as delivered from fear of the consequences of sin, that is, from the wrath of God.

Consequently, the work of salvation is intended to save man from the fear of God. Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 659.

God has a terrible double aspect: a sea of grace is met by a seething lake of fire, and the light of love glows with a fierce dark heat which it is said, ‘ardet non lucet’—it burns but gives no light.

That is the eternal, as distinct from the temporal, gospel: one can love God but must fear him. Carl Jung, CW 11, § 733.

The paradoxical nature of God has a like effect on man: it tears him asunder into opposites and delivers him over to a seemingly insoluble conflict.

What happens in such a condition?

Here we must let psychology speak, for psychology represents the sum of all the observations and insights it has gained from the empirical study of severe states of conflict.

There are, for example, conflicts of duty no one knows how to solve. Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 738

Job realizes God's inner antinomy, and in the light of this realization his knowledge attains a divine numinosity. Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 584

We can, of course, hope for the undeserved grace of God, who hears our prayers.

But God, who also does not hear our prayers, wants to become man, and for that purpose he has chosen, through the Holy Ghost, the creaturely man filled with darkness—the natural man who is tainted with original sin and who learnt the divine arts and sciences from the fallen angels. Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 746.

Since the Apocalypse we now know again that God is not only to be loved, but also to be feared.

He fills us with evil as well as with good, otherwise he would not need to be feared; and because he wants to become man, the uniting of his antinomy must take place in man.

This involves man in a new responsibility.

He can no longer wriggle out of it on the plea of his littleness and nothingness, for the dark God has slipped the atom bomb and chemical weapons into his hands and given him the power to empty out the apocalyptic vials of wrath on his fellow creatures.

Since he has been granted an almost godlike power, he can no longer remain blind and unconscious.

He [Man] must know something of God's nature and of metaphysical processes if he is to understand himself and thereby achieve gnosis of the Divine. Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 747.

One should make clear to oneself what it means when God becomes man.

It means more or less what Creation meant in the beginning, namely an objectivation of God.

At the time of the Creation he [God] revealed himself in Nature; now he wants to be more specific and become man.

It must be admitted, however, that there was a tendency in this direction right from the start.

For, when those other human beings, who had evidently been created before Adam, appeared on the scene along with the higher mammals, Yahweh created on the following day, by a special act of creation, a man who was the image of God.

This was the first prefiguration of his becoming man.

He took Adam's descendants, especially the people of Israel, into his personal possession, and from time to time he filled this people's prophets with his spirit.

All these things were preparatory events and symptoms of a tendency within God to become man.

But in omniscience there had existed from all eternity a knowledge of the human nature of God or of the divine nature of man.

That is why, long before Genesis was written, we find corresponding testimonies in the ancient Egyptian records.

These intimations and prefigurations of the Incarnation must strike one as either completely incomprehensible or superfluous, since all creation ex nihilo [from nothing] is God's and consists of nothing but God, with the result that man, like the rest of creation, is simply God become concrete.

Prefigurations, however, are not in themselves creative events, but are only stages in the process of becoming conscious.

It was only quite late that we realized (or rather, that we are beginning to realize) that God is Reality itself and therefore—last but not least —man. This realization is a millennial process. Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 631.

No one can know what the ultimate things are.

We must therefore take them as we experience them.

And if such experience helps to make life healthier, more beautiful, more complete and more satisfactory to yourself and to those you love, you may safely say: "This was the grace of God." Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 167.

Carl Jung’s "Fireside Chats" (2019-06-17 05:06)

Jung in his late seventies no longer taught at the C. G. Jung Institute, though Emma did.

But twice yearly he invited diploma candidates, like Peter Lynn, to his Kusnacht house for "fireside chats." Claire Dunne, Wounded Healer of the Soul, Page 167.

He would stand by the fireplace, pipe in mouth, and ask for questions on anything and everything, encouraging us to engage him in dialogue.

My most vivid recollection of these extraordinary evenings is the experience of Jung as a giant whose head touched the clouds and whose feet were rooted in the very center of the earth.

Within the same sentence he would connect an earthy, peasant-type joke (laughing uproariously) with an obscure pre-Christian myth, both directly relevant to the question under discussion.

I used to come away from these gatherings with a great sense of awe, having glimpsed ultimate issues in a thoroughly human context. Peter Lynn, J.E.T., Page 41.

Carl Jung: ... You have put me in a somewhat embarrassing position with your question in yesterday's letter. (2019-06-17 05:11)

From Dr. Loy 2 February 1913

You answer several of my questions in a decidedly affirmative tone, taking it as proved that in cures by the cathartic method the main role is played by faith in the analyst and his method and not by "abreacting" the real or imaginary traumata.

I think so too.

Equally I agree with your view that the old "apothecaries' messes," as well as the Lourdes cures or those of the mental healers, Christian Scientists, and persuasionists, are to be attributed to faith in the miracle-worker rather than to any of the methods employed.

But now comes the ticklish point: the augur can remain an augur so long as he himself believes that the will of the gods is made manifest by the entrails of the sacrificial beast.

When he no longer believes, he can ask himself: Shall I continue to use my augur's authority to promote the welfare of the State, or shall I make use of my newer, and I hope truer, convictions of today? Both ways are possible.

The first is called opportunism, the second the pursuit of truth and scientific honesty.

For the doctor, the first way perhaps brings therapeutic success and fame, the second brings the reproach that such a man is not to be taken seriously.

What I esteem most highly in Freud and his school is just this passionate desire for truth.

On the other hand some people pronounce a different verdict: "It is impossible for a busy practitioner to keep pace with the development of the views of this investigator and his initiates" (Frank, Affektstorungen, Introduction, p. 2).

One can easily disregard this little quip, but self-criticism needs to be taken more seriously.

One can after all ask oneself: Since science is in continual flux, have I the right to ignore on principle any method or combination of methods by which I know I can get therapeutic results?

Looking more closely at the fundamental reason for your aversion to the ancillary use of hypnosis (or semi-hypnosis; the degree matters nothing) in treatment by suggestion (which as you say every doctor and every therapeutic method makes use of willy-nilly, no matter what it is called), one must say that what has disgusted you with hypnotism is at bottom nothing but the so-called "transference" to the doctor, which you, with your purely psychoanalytic procedure, can eliminate as little as anybody else, and which actually plays an essential part in the success of the treatment.

Your requirement that the psychoanalyst must be responsible for the cleanness of his hands—here I agree unreservedly—is the logical conclusion.

But is the possible recourse to hypnosis in a psychotherapeutic procedure any more "augurish" than the unavoidable use of the "transference to the analyst" for therapeutic purposes?

In either case we bank on faith as the healing agent.

As for the feeling which the patient—whether man or woman—entertains for the analyst, is there never anything in the background save a conscious or unconscious sexual wish?

In many cases your impression is certainly correct, and more than one woman has been frank enough to confess that the beginning of hypnosis was accompanied by a voluptuous sensation.

But it is not true in all instances—or how would you explain the underlying feeling in the hypnotizing of one animal by another, e.g., snake and bird?

Surely you would say that here the feeling of fear prevails, which is an inversion of libido, whereas in the hypnoid state that comes over the female before she succumbs to the male it is the pure libido sexualis that predominates, though possibly still mixed with fear.

However that may be, from your three cases I cannot draw any ethical distinction between ”susceptibility to the hypnotist" and "transference to the analyst" that would condemn a possible combination of hypnosis with psychoanalysis, as an auxiliary.

You will ask why I cling so much to the use of hypnosis, or rather of the hypnoid state.

It is because I think there are cases that can be cured much more quickly in this way than by a purely psychoanalytic procedure.

For example, in no more than five or six interviews I completely cured a fifteen-year-old girl who had suffered from enuresis nocturna even since infancy, but was otherwise perfectly sound, gifted, first in her class, etc.

Previously she had tried all sorts of treatment without any result.

Perhaps I ought to have sought out the psychoanalytic connections between the enuresis and her psychosexual disposition, explained it to her, etc., but I couldn't, the girl had only the short Easter holidays for treatment: so I just hypnotized her and the trouble vanished.

In psychoanalysis I use hypnosis to help the patient overcome "resistance."

Further, I use semi-hypnosis in conjunction with psychoanalysis to accelerate the "reconstruction" stage.

To take an example, a patient afflicted with a washing mania was sent to me after a year's psychocathartic treatment with Dr. X.

The symbolic meaning of her washing ceremonies had previously been explained to her, but she became more and more agitated during the "abreaction" of alleged traumata in childhood, because she had persuaded herself by auto-suggestion that she was too old to be cured, that she saw no "images," etc.

So I used hypnosis to help her reduce the number of washings—"so that the anxiety feeling would stay away" -and to train her to throw things on the floor and pick them up again without washing her hands afterwards, etc.

In view of these considerations I should, if you feel disposed to go further into the matter, be grateful if you would furnish me with more convincing reasons why the hypnotic procedure is to be condemned, and explain how to do without it, or what to replace it with in such cases.

Were I convinced, I would give it up as you have done; but what convinced you has not, so far, convinced me. Si duo faciunt idem, non est idem.

598 I would now like to go on to another important matter to which you alluded, but only cursorily, and to put one question: Behind the neurotic fantasies there is almost always (or always) a moral conflict belonging to the present.

That is perfectly clear to me. Research and therapy coincide; their task is: to seek the causes and the rational solution of the conflict.

Good.—But can the rational solution always be found?

"Reasons of expediency" so often bar the way, varying with the type of patient (children, young girls and women, from "pious"—hypocritical!—Catholic or Protestant families). Again that accursed opportunism!—

A colleague of mine was perfectly right when he began to give sexual enlightenment to a young French boy who was indulging in masturbation.

Whereupon, like one possessed, in rushed a bigoted grandmother, and a disagreeable scene ensued.

How to act in these and similar cases?

What to do in cases where there is a moral conflict between love and duty (conflicts in marriage)—or in general between instinct and moral duty?

What to do in the case of a girl afflicted with hysterical or anxiety symptoms, who is in need of love and has no chance to marry, or cannot find a suitable man, and, because she comes of "good family," wants to remain chaste?

Simply try to get rid of the symptoms by suggestion? But that is wrong as soon as one knows of a better way.

How is one to reconcile one's two consciences: that of the man who does not want to confine his fidelity to truth intra muros, and that of the doctor who must cure, or if he dares not cure according to his real convictions (owing to opportunist motives), must at least provide some alleviation?

We live in the present, but with the ideas and the ideals of the future. That is our conflict. How to resolve it?

From Dr. Jung 4 February 1913

... You have put me in a somewhat embarrassing position with your question in yesterday's letter.

You have rightly guessed the spirit which dictated my last.

I am glad you, too, acknowledge this spirit. There are not very many who can boast of such liberalism.

I should deceive myself if I thought I was a practising physician. I am above all an investigator, and this naturally gives me a different attitude to many problems.

In my last letter I purposely left the practical needs of the doctor out of account, chiefly in order to show you on what grounds one might be moved to give up hypnotic therapy.

To anticipate a possible objection, let me say at once that I did not give up hypnosis because I wanted to avoid dealing with the basic forces of the human psyche, but because I wanted to battle with them directly and openly.

When once I understood what kind of forces play a part in hypnotism I gave it up, simply to get rid of all the indirect advantages of this method.

As we psychoanalysts find to our cost every day—and our patients also—we do not work with the "transference to the analyst," but against it and in spite of it.

Hence we do not bank on the faith of the patient, but on his criticism. So much I would say for now about this delicate question.

As your letter shows, we are at one in regard to the theoretical aspect of treatment by suggestion.

We can therefore apply ourselves to the further task of reaching agreement on practical questions.

Your remarks on the doctor’s dilemma—whether to be a magician or a scientist—bring us to the heart of the matter.

I strive not to be a fanatic—though there are not a few who accuse me of fanaticism.

I struggle merely for the recognition of methods of research and their results, not for the application of psychoanalytic methods at all costs.

I was a medical practitioner quite long enough to realize that practice obeys, and must obey, other laws than does the search for truth.

One might almost say that the practitioner must submit first and foremost to the law of expediency.

The investigator would be doing him a great wrong if he accused him of not using the "one true" scientific method.

As I said to you in my last letter: "A truth is a truth, when it works."

On the other hand, the practitioner must not reproach the investigator if in his search for truth and for new and perhaps better methods he tries out unusual procedures.

After all, it is not the practitioner who will have to bear the brunt, but the investigator and possibly his patient.

The practitioner must certainly use those methods which he knows how to apply to the greatest advantage and which give him relatively the best results.

My liberalism, as you see, extends even to Christian Science.

But I deem it most uncalled for that Frank, a practising doctor, should cast aspersions on research in which he cannot participate—the very line of research to which he owes his own method.

It is surely high time to stop this running down of every new idea.

No one asks Frank and his confreres to be psychoanalysts.

We grant them their right to existence, why should they always seek to curtail ours?

As my own "cures" show you, I do not doubt the effect of suggestion. I merely had the feeling that I might be able to discover something still better.

This hope has been justified. Not for ever shall it be said:

If ever in this world we reach what's good We call what's better just a plain falsehood!

I frankly confess that if I were doing your work I should often be in difficulties if I relied on psychoanalysis alone.

I can scarcely imagine a general practice, especially in a sanatorium, with no other auxiliaries than psychoanalysis.

It is true that at Bircher's sanatorium in Zurich the principle of psychoanalysis has been adopted, at least by several of the assistants, but a whole series of other important educative influences are also brought to bear on the patients, without which things would probably go very badly.

In my own purely psychoanalytic practice I have often regretted that I could not avail myself of other methods of re-education that are naturally at hand in an institution—but only, of course, in special cases where one is dealing with particularly uncontrolled, untrained patients.

Which of us would assert that he has discovered the panacea?

There are cases where psychoanalysis works worse than any other method.

But who has ever claimed that psychoanalysis should be used always and everywhere?

Only a fanatic could maintain such a view.

Patients for whom psychoanalysis is suitable have to be selected.

I unhesitatingly send cases I think unsuitable to other doctors.

This does not happen often, as a matter of fact, because patients have a way of sorting themselves out.

Those who go to a psychoanalyst usually know quite well why they go to him and not to someone else.

Moreover there are very many neurotics excellently suited for psychoanalysis.

In these matters all schematism is to be abhorred.

It is never quite wise to run your head against a brick wall.

Whether simple hypnotism, or cathartic treatment, or psychoanalysis shall be used must be determined by the conditions of the case and the preference of the doctor.

Every doctor will obtain the best results with the instrument he knows best.

But, barring exceptions, I must say definitely that for me, as well as for my patients, psychoanalysis works better than any other method.

This is not merely a matter of feeling; from manifold experiences I know many cases can still be helped by psychoanalysis that are refractory to all other methods of treatment.

I know many colleagues whose experience is the same, even men engaged exclusively in practical work.

It is scarcely credible that an altogether inferior method would meet with so much support.

When once psychoanalysis has been applied in a suitable case, it is imperative that rational solutions of the conflicts should be found.

The objection is at once advanced that many conflicts are intrinsically insoluble.

People sometimes take this view because they think only of external solutions—which at bottom are not solutions at all.

If a man cannot get on with his wife, he naturally thinks the conflict would be solved if he married someone else.

When such marriages are examined they are seen to be no solution whatever.

The old Adam enters upon the new marriage and bungles it just as badly as he did the earlier one.

A real solution comes only from within, and then only because the patient has been brought to a different attitude.

If an external solution is possible no psychoanalysis is necessary; but if an internal solution is sought, we are faced with the peculiar task of psychoanalysis.

The conflict between "love and duty" must be solved on that level of character where "love and duty" are no longer opposites, which in reality they are not.

Similarly, the familiar conflict between "instinct and conventional morality" must be solved in such a way that both factors are taken sufficiently into account, and this again is possible only through a change of character.

This change psychoanalysis can bring about.

In such cases external solutions are worse than none at all.

Naturally, expediency determines which road the doctor must ultimately follow and what is then his duty.

I regard the conscience-searching question of whether he should remain true to his scientific convictions as a minor one in comparison with the far weightier question of how he can best help his patient.

The doctor must, on occasion, be able to play the augur.

Mundus vult decipi—but the curative effect is no deception.

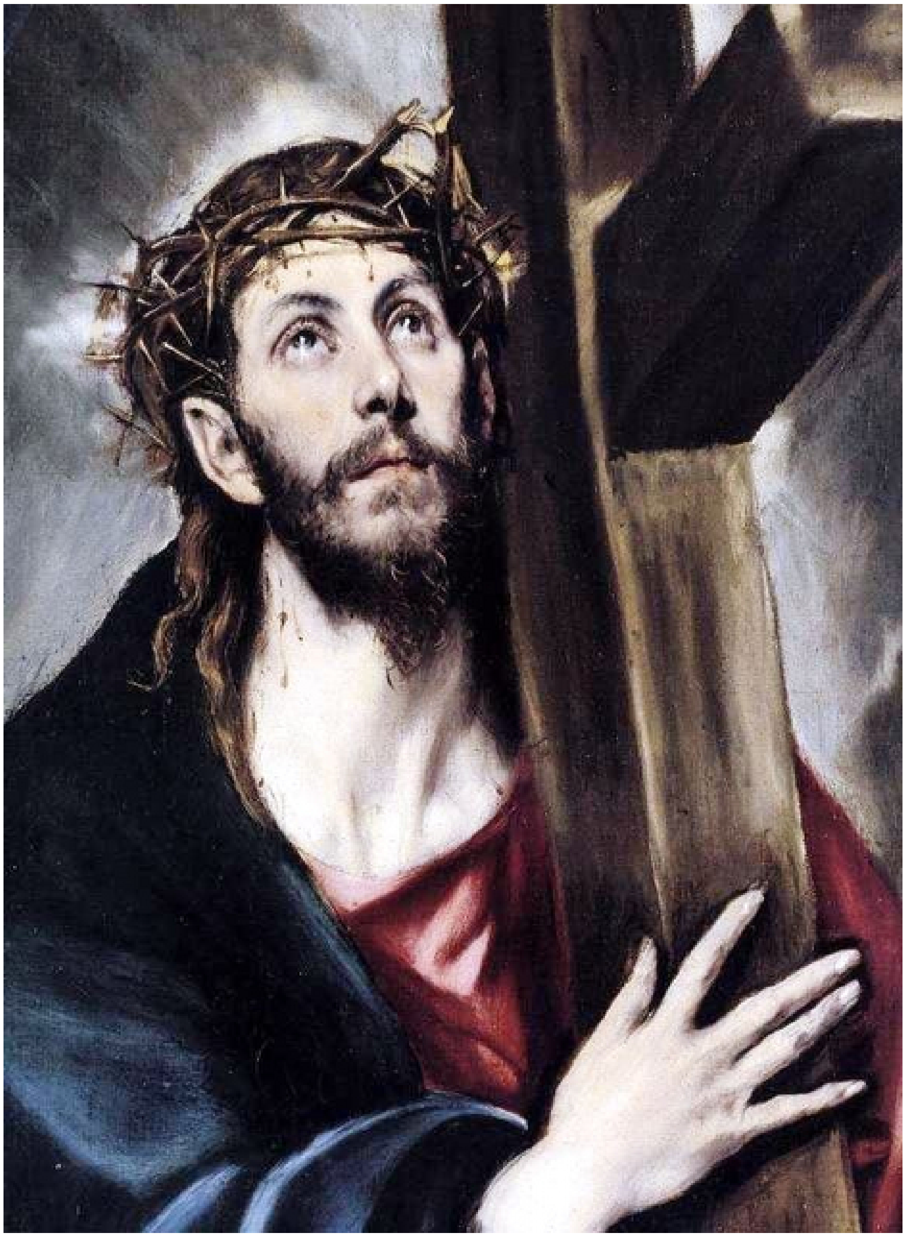
It is true that there is a conflict between ideal conviction and concrete possibility.

But we should ill prepare the ground for the seed of the future were we to forget the tasks of the present, and sought only to cultivate ideals.

That would be but idle dreaming.

Do not forget that Kepler once cast horoscopes for money, and that countless artists are condemned to work for a living wage. Carl Jung, CW 4, Para 584-607

Carl Jung: "We imitate Christ and hope he will deliver us from our own fate." (2019-06-17 05:12)



Christ. . . took himself with exemplary seriousness and lived his life to the bitter end, regardless of human convention and in opposition to his own lawful tradition, as the worst heretic in the eyes of the Jews and a madman in the eyes of his family.

But we?

We imitate Christ and hope he will deliver us from our own fate.

Like little lambs we follow the shepherd, naturally to good pastures.

No talk at all of uniting our Above and Below!

On the contrary Christ and his cross deliver us from our conflict, which we simply leave alone. . . . Instead of bearing ourselves, i.e., our own cross, ourselves, we load Christ with our unresolved conflicts.

We "place ourselves under his cross," but by golly not under our own. . . . The cross of Christ was borne by himself and was his.

To put oneself under somebody else’s cross, which has already been carried by him, is certainly easier than to carry your own cross amid the mockery and contempt of the world.

That way you remain nicely ensconced in tradition and are praised as devout.

This is well-organized Pharisaism and highly un-Christian.

Whoever imitates Christ and has the cheek to want to take Christ’s cross on himself when he can’t even carry his own has in my view not yet learnt the ABC of the Christian message.

Have your congregation understood that they must close their eyes to the traditional teachings and go through the darkness of their own souls and set aside everything in order to become that which every individual bears in himself as his individual task, and that no one can take this burden from him?

We continually pray that "this cup may pass from us" and not harm us.

Even Christ did so, but without success. . . . We might. . . discover, among other things, that in every feature Christ’s life is a prototype of individuation and hence cannot be imitated: one can only live one’s own life totally in the same way with all the consequences this entails. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 76-77.

Carl Jung’s "Bollingen Tower" (2019-06-17 05:24)

The Tower

Gradually, through my scientific work, I was able toput my fantasies and the contents of the unconscious on a solid footing.Words and paper, however, did not seem real enough to me; something more was needed.

I had to achieve a kind of representation in stone of my innermost thoughts and of the knowledge I had acquired.

Or, to put it another way, I had to make a confession of faith in stone.

That was the beginning of the "Tower," the house which I built for myself at Bollingen.

It was settled from the start that I would build near the water.

I had always been curiously drawn by the scenic charm of the upper lake of Zurich, and so in 1922 I bought some land in Bollingen.

It is situated in the area of St. Meinrad and is old church land, having formerly belonged to the monastery of St. Gall.

At first I did not plan a proper house, but merely a kind of primitive one-story dwelling. It was to be a round structure with a hearth in the center and bunks along the walls.

I more or less had in mind an African hut where die fire, ringed by a few stones, burns in the middle, and the whole life of the family revolves around this center.

Primitive huts concretize an idea of wholeness, a familial wholeness in which all sorts of small domestic animals likewise participate.

But I altered the plan even during the first stages of building, for I felt it was too primitive.

I realized it would have to be a regular two-story house, not a mere hut crouched on the ground.

So in 1923 the first round house was built, and when it was finished I saw that it had become a suitable dwelling tower.

The feeling of repose and renewal that I had in this tower was intense from the start.

It represented for me the maternal hearth.

But I became increasingly aware that it did not yet express everything that needed saying, that something was still, lacking.

And so, four years later, in 1927, the central structure was added, with a tower-like annex.

After some time had passed again the interval was four years I once more had a feeling of incompleteness.

The building still seemed too primitive to me, and so in 1931 the towerlike annex was extended.

I wanted a room in this tower where I could exist for myself alone.

I had in mind what I had seen in Indian houses, in which there is usually an area though it may be only a corner of a room separated off by a curtain to which the inhabitants can withdraw.

There they meditate for perhaps a quarter or half an hour, or do Yoga exercises.

Such an area of retirement is essential in India, where people live crowded very close together.

In my retiring room I am by myself. I keep the key with me all the time; no one else is allowed in there except with my permission.

In the course of the years I have done paintings on the walls, and so have expressed all those things which have carried me out of time into seclusion, out of the present into timelessness.

Thus the second tower became for me a place of spiritual concentration.

In 1935 the desire arose in me for a piece of fenced-in land, I needed a larger space that would stand open to the sky and to nature.

And so- once again after an interval of four years I added a courtyard and a loggia by the lake, which formed a fourth element that was separated from the unitary threeness of the house.

Thus a quaternity had arisen, four different parts of the building, and, moreover, in the course of twelve years.

After my wife’s death in 1955, I felt an inner obligation to become what I myself am.

To put it in the language of the Bollingen house, I suddenly realized that the small central section which crouched so low, so hidden, was myself!

I could no longer hide myself behind the "maternal" and the "spiritual" towers.

So, in that same year, I added an upper story to this section, which represents myself, or my ego-personality.

Earlier, I would not have been able to do this; I would have regarded it as presumptuous self-emphasis.

Now it signified an extension of consciousness achieved in old age.

With that the building was complete.

I had started the first tower in 1923, two months after the death of my mother.

These two dates are meaningful because the Tower, as we shall see, is connected with the dead.

From the beginning I felt the Tower as in some way a place of maturation a maternal womb or a maternal figure in which I could become what I was, what I am and will be.

It gave me a feeling as if I were being reborn in stone.

It is thus a concretization of the incjividuation process, a memorial aere perennius.

During the building work, of course, I never considered these matters.

I built the house in sections, always following the concrete needs of the moment.

It might also be said that I built,

it in a kind of dream.

Only afterward did I see how all the parts fitted together and that a meaningful form had resulted: a symbol of psychic wholeness.

At Bollingen I am in the midst of my true life, I am most deeply myself.

Here I am, as it were, the "age-old son of the mother."

That is how alchemy puts it, very wisely, for the "old man/* the "ancient," whom I had already experienced as a child, is personality No. 2, who has always been and always will be.

He exists outside time and is the son of the maternal unconscious.

In my fantasies he took the form of Philemon, and he comes to life again at Bollingen.

At times I feel as if I am spread out over the landscape and inside things, and am myself living in every tree, in the plashing of the waves, in the clouds and the animals that come and go, in the procession of the seasons.

There is nothing in the Tower that has not grown into its own form over the decades, nothing with which I am not linked.

Here everything has its history, and mine; here is space for the spaceless kingdom of the world's and the psyche's hinterland.

I have done without electricity, and tend the fireplace and stove myself.

Evenings, I light the old lamps.

There is no running water, and I pump the water from the well.

I chop the wood and cook the food.

These simple acts make man simple; and how difficult it is to be simple!

In Bollingen, silence surrounds me almost audibly, and I live "in modest harmony with nature."

Thoughts rise to the surface which reach back into the centuries, and accordingly anticipate a remote future.

Here the torment of creation is lessened; creativity and play are close together.

In 1950 I made a kind of monument out of stone to express what the Tower means to me.

The story of how this stone came to me is a curious one.

I needed stones for building the enclosing wall for the so-called garden, and ordered them from the quarry near Bollingen.

I was standing by when the mason gave all the measurements to the owner of the quarry, who wrote them down in his notebook.

When the stones arrived by ship and were unloaded, it turned out that the cornerstone had altogether the wrong measurements; instead of a triangular stone, a square block had been sent: a perfect cube of much larger dimensions than had been ordered, about twenty inches thick.

The mason was furious and told the barge men to take it right back with them.

But when I saw the stone, I said, "No, that is my stone, I must have it"

For I had seen at once that it suited me perfectly and that I wanted to do something with it.

Only I did not yet know what.

The first thing that occurred to me was a Latin verse by the alchemist Arnaldus de Villanova (died 1313).

I chiseled this into the stone; in translation it goes:

Here stands the mean, uncomely stone,

"Tis very cheap in price!

The more it is despised by fools,

The more loved by the wise.

This verse refers to the alchemist’s stone, the lapis, which is despised and rejected.

Soon something else emerged.

I began to see on the front face, in the natural structure of the stone, a small circle, a sort of eye, which looked at me.

I chiseled it into the stone, and in the center made a tiny homunculus.

This corresponds to the ’Tittle doll" (pupilla) yourself which you see in the pupil of another’s eye; a kind of Kabir, or the Telesphoros of Asklepios.

Ancient statues show him wearing a hooded cloak and carrying a lantern.

At the same time he is a pointer of the way.

I dedicated a few words to him which came into my mind while I was working.

The inscription is in Greek; the translation goes:

Time is a child playing like a child playing a board game the kingdom of the child. This is Telesphoros, who roams through the dark regions of this cosmos and glows like a star out of the depths. He points the way to the gates of the sun and to the land of dreams.

These words came to me one after the other while I worked on the stone.

On the third face, the one facing the lake, I let the stone itself speak, as it were, in a Latin inscription.

These sayings are more or less quotations from alchemy.

This is the translation:

I am an orphan, alone; nevertheless I am found everywhere. I am one, but opposed to myself. I am youth and old man at one and the same time. I have known neither father nor mother, because I have had to be fetched out of the deep like a fish, or fell like a white stone from heaven. In woods and mountains I roam, but I am hidden in the innermost soul of man. I am mortal for everyone, yet I am not touched by the cycle of aeons.

In conclusion, under the saying of Arnaldus de Villanova, I set down in Latin the words "In remembrance of his seventyfifth birthday C. G. Jung made and placed this here as a thanks offering, in the year 1950.”

When the stone was finished, I looked at it again and again, wondering about it and asking myself what lay behind my impulse to carve it.

The stone stands outside the Tower, and is like an explanation of it. It is a manifestation of the occupant, but one which remains incomprehensible to others.

Do you know what I wanted to chisel into the back face of the stone? "Le cri de Merlinr

For what the stone expressed reminded me of Merlin’s life in the forest, after he had vanished from the world.

Men still hear his cries, so the legend runs, but they cannot understand or interpret them.

Merlin represents an attempt by the medieval unconscious to create a parallel figure to Parsifal. Parsifal is a Christian hero, and Merlin, son of the devil and a pure virgin, is his dark brother.

In the twelfth century, when the legend arose, there were as yet no premises by which his intrinsicf meaning could be understood.

Hence he ended in exile, and hence e’le cri de Merlin which still sounded from the forest after his death.

This cry that no one could understand implies that he lives on in unredeemed form.

His story is not yet finished, and he still walks abroad.

It might be said that the secret of Merlin was carried on by alchemy, primarily in the figure of Mercurius.

Then Merlin was taken up again in my psychology of the unconscious and remains uncomprehended to this day!

That is because most people find it quite beyond them to live on close terms with the unconscious.

Again and again I have had to learn howhard this is for people.

I was in Bollingen just as the first tower was being finished.

This was the winter of 1923-24.

As far as I can recall, there was no snow on the ground; perhaps it was early spring. I had been alone perhaps for a week, perhaps longer.

An indescribable stillness prevailed.

One evening I can still remember it precisely I was sitting by the fireplace and had put a big kettle on the fire to make hot water for washing up.

The water began to boil and the kettle to sing.

It sounded like many voices, or stringed instruments, or even like a whole orchestra.

It was just like polyphonic music, which in reality I cannot abide, though in this case it seemed to me peculiarly interesting.

It was as though there were one orchestra inside the Tower and another one outside.

Now one dominated, now the other, as though they were responding to each other, I sat and listened, fascinated.

For far more than an hour I listened to the concert, to this natural melody.

It was soft music, containing, as well, all the discords of nature.

And that was right, for nature is not only harmonious; she is also dreadfully contradictory and chaotic.

The music was that way too: an outpouring of sounds, having the quality of water and of wind so strange that it is simply impossible to describe it.

On another such still night when I was alone in Bollingen (it was in the late winter or early spring of 1924) I awoke to the sound of soft footsteps going around the Tower.

Distant music sounded, coming closer and closer, and then I heard voices laughing and talking.

I thought, ’Who can be prowling around? What is this all about? There is only the little footpath along the lake, and scarcely anybody ever walks on it!”

While I was thinking these things I became wide awake, and went to the window.

I opened the shutters all was still.

There was no one in sight, nothing to be heard no wind nothing nothing at all.

"This is really strange, I thought.

I was certain that the footsteps, the laughter and talk, had been real.

But apparently I had only been dreaming.

I returned to bed and mulled over the way we can deceive ourselves after all, and what might have been the cause of such a strange dream.

In the midst of this, I fell asleep again and at once the same dream began: once more I heard footsteps, talk, laughter, music.

At the same time I had a visual image of several hundred dark-clad figures, possibly peasant boys in their Sunday clothes, who had come down from the mountains and were pouring in around the Tower, on both sides, with a great deal of loud trampling, laughing, singing, and playing of accordions.

Irritably, I thought, "This is really the limit! I thought it was a dream and now it turns out to be reality!"

At this point, I woke up. Once again I jumped up, opened the window and shutters, and found everything just the same as before: a deathly still moonlit night.

Then I thought: "Why, this is simply a case of haunting!"

Naturally I asked myself what it meant when a dream was so insistent on its reality and at the same time on my being awake.

Usually we experience that only when we see a ghost.

Being awake means perceiving reality.

The dream therefore represented a situation equivalent to reality, in which it created a kind of wakened state. In this sort of dream, as opposed to ordinary dreams, the unconscious seems bent on conveying a powerful impression of reality to the dreamer, an impression which is emphasized by repetition.

The sources of such realities are known to be physical sensations on the one hand, and archetypal figures on the other.

That night everything was so completely real, or at least seemed to be so, that I could scarcely sort out the two realities.

Nor could I make anything of the dream itself.

What was the meaning of these music-making peasant boys passing by in a long procession?

It seemed to me they had come out of curiosity, in order to look at the Tower.

Never again did I experience or dream anything similar, and I cannot recall ever having heard of a parallel to it.

It was only much later that I found an explanation.

This was when I came across the seventeenth-century Lucerne chronicle by Rennward Cysat.

He tells the following story: On a high pasture of Mount Pilatus, which is particularly notorious for spooks it is said that Wotan to this day practices his magic arts there Cysat, while climbing the mountain, was disturbed one night by a procession of men who poured past his hut on both sides, playing music and singing precisely what I had experienced at the Tower.

The next morning Cysat asked the herdsman with whom he had spent that night what could have been the meaning pf it.

The man had a ready explanation: those must be the departed folk sdlig Ltit, in Swiss dialect; the phrase also means blessed folk namely, Wotan’s army of departed souls.

These, he said, were in the habit of walking abroad and showing themselves.

It may be suggested that this is a phenomenon of solitude, the outward emptiness and silence being compensated by the image of a crowd of people.

This would put it in the same class with the hallucinations of hermits, which are likewise compensatory.

But do we know what realities such stories may be founded on?

It is also possible that I had been so sensitized by the solitude that I was able to perceive the procession of "departed folk" who passed by.

The explanation of this experience as a psychic compensation never entirely satisfied me, and to say that it was a hallucination seemed to me to beg the question.

I felt obliged to consider the possibility of its reality, especially in view of the seventeenth century account which had come my way.

It would seem most likely to have been a synchronistic phenomenon.

Such phenomena demonstrate that premonitions or visions very often have some correspondence in external reality.

There actually existed, as I discovered, a real parallel to my experience.

In the Middle Ages just such gatherings of young men took place.

These were the Reislaufer (mercenaries) who usually assembled in spring, marched from Central Switzerland to Locarno, met at the Casa di Ferro in Minusio and then marched on together to Milan.

In Italy they served as soldiers, fighting for foreign princes.

My vision, therefore, might have been one of these gatherings which took place regularly each spring when the young men, with singing and jollity, bade farewell to their native land.

When we began to build at Bollingen in 1923, my eldest daughter came to see the spot, and exclaimed,

What, you’re building here? There are .corpses about!"

Naturally I thought, "Ridiculous! Nothing of the sort!"

But when we were constructing the annex four years later, we did come upon a skeleton.

It lay at a depth of seven feet in the ground.

An old rifle bullet was imbedded in the elbow.

From various indications it seemed evident that the body had been thrown into the grave in an advanced state of decay.

It belonged to one of the many dozens of French soldiers who were drowned in the Linth in 1799 and were later washed up on the shores of the Upper Lake.

These men were drowned when the Austrians blew up the bridge of Grynau which the French were storming.

A photograph of the open grave with the skeleton and the date of its discovery August 22, 1927 is preserved at the Tower.

I arranged a regular burial on my property, and fired a gun three times over the soldier’s grave.

Then I set up a gravestone with an inscription for him.

My daughter had sensed the presence of the dead body.

Her power to sense such things is something she inherits from my grandmother on my mother’s side.

In the winter of 1955-56 I chiseled the names of my paternal ancestors on three stone tablets and placed them in the courtyard of the Tower.

I painted the ceiling with motifs from my own and my wife’s arms, and from those of my sons-in-law.

The Jung family originally had a phoenix for its arms, the bird obviously being connected with "young," "youth," "rejuvenation."

My grandfather changed the elements of the arms, probably out of a spirit of resistance toward his father.

He was an ardent Freemason and Grand Master of the Swiss lodge.

This had a good deal to do with the changes he made in the armorial bearings.

I mention this point, in itself of no consequence, because it belongs in the historical nexus of my thinking and my life.

In keeping with this revision of my grandfather's, my coat of arms no longer contains the original phoenix.

Instead there is a cross azure in chief dexter and in base sinister a blue bunch of grapes in a field d'or; separating these is an estoile d'or in a fess azure.

The symbolism of these arms is Masonic, or Rosicrucian.

Just as cross and rose represent the Rosicrucian problem of opposites ("per crucem ad rosam"), that is, the Christian and Dionysian elements, so cross and grapes are symbols of the heavenly and the chthonic spirit.

The uniting symbol is the gold star, the aurum philosophorum.

The Rosicrucians derived from Hermetic or alchemical philosophy.

One of their founders was Michael Maier (1568-1622), a well-known alchemist and younger contemporary of the relatively unknown but more important Gerardus Dorneus (end of the sixteenth century), whose treatises fill the first volume of the Theatrum Chemicum of 1602.

The two men lived in Frankfurt, which seems to have been a center of alchemical philosophy at the time.

In any case, as Count Palatine and court physician to Rudolph II, Michael Maier was something of a local celebrity.

In neighboring Mainz at that time lived Dr. med. et. jur. Carl Jung (died 1654), of whom nothing else is known, since the family tree breaks off with my great-great-grandfather who lived at the beginning of the eighteenth century.

This was Sigmund Jung, a civis Moguntinus, citizen of Mainz.

The hiatus is due to the fact that the municipal archives of Mainz were burned in the course of a siege during the War of the Spanish Succession.

It is a safe surmise that this evidently learned Dr. Carl Jung was familiar with the writings of the two alchemists, for the pharmacology of the day was still very much under the influence of Paracelsus.

Dorneus was an outspoken Paracelsist and even composed a voluminous commentary on the Paracelsan treatise, De Vita Longa.

He also, more than all the other alchemists, dealt with the process of individuation.

In view of the fact that a large part of my life work has revolved around the study of the problem of opposites, and especially their alchemical symbolism, all this is not without a certain interest.

When I was working on the stone tablets, I became aware of the fateful links between me and my ancestors.

I feel very strongly that I am under the influence of things or questions which were left incomplete and unanswered by my parents and grandparents and more distant ancestors.

It often seems as if there were an impersonal karma within a family, which is passed on from parents to children.

It has always seemed to me that I had to answer questions which fate had posed to my forefathers, and which had not yet been answered, or as if I had to complete, or perhaps continue, things which previous ages had left unfinished.

It is difficult to determine whether these questions are more of a personal or more of a general (collective) nature.

It seems to me that the latter is the case.

A collective problem, if not recognized as such, always appears as a personal problem, and in individual cases may give the impression that something is out of order in the realm of the personal psyche.

The personal sphere is indeed disturbed, but such disturbances need not be primary; they may well be secondary, the consequence of an insupportable change in the social atmosphere.

The cause of disturbance is, therefore, not to be sought in the personal surroundings, but rather in the collective situation.

Psychotherapy has hitherto taken this matter far too little into account.

Like anyone who is capable of some introspection, I had early taken it for granted that the split in my personality was my own purely personal affair and responsibility.

Faust, to be sure, had made the problem somewhat easier for me by confessing, "Two souls, alas, are housed within my breast"; but he had thrown no light on the cause of this dichotomy.

His insight seemed, in a sense, directed straight at me.

In the days when I first read Faust I could not remotely guess the extent to which Goethe's strange heroic myth was a collective experience and that it prophetically anticipated the fate of the Germans.

Therefore I felt personally implicated, and when Faust, in his hubris and self-inflation, caused the murder of Philemon and Baucis, I felt guilty, quite as if I myself in the past had helped commit the murder of the two old people.

This strange idea alarmed me, and I regarded it as my responsibility to atone for this crime, or to prevent its repetition.

My false conclusion was further supported by a bit of odd information that I picked up during those early years, I heard that it had been bruited about that my grandfather Jung had been an illegitimate son of Goethe's.

This annoying story made an impression upon me insofar as it at once corroborated and seemed to explain my curious reactions to Faust.

It is true that I did not believe in reincarnation, but I was instinctively familiar with that concept which the Indians call karma.

Since in those days I had no idea of the existence of the unconscious, I could not have had any psychological understanding of my reactions.

I also did not know no more than, even today, it is generally known that the future is unconsciously prepared long in advance and therefore can be guessed by clairvoyants.

Thus, when the news arrived o the crowning of Kaiser Wilhelm I at Versailles, Jakob Burckhardt exclaimed, "That is the doom of Germany."

The archetypes of Wagner were already knocking at the gates, and along with them came the Dionysian experience of Nietzsche which might better be ascribed to the god of ecstasy, Wotan.

The hubris of the Wilhelmine era alienated Europe and paved the way for the disaster of 1914.

In my youth (around 1890) I was unconsciously caught up by this spirit of the age, and had no methods at hand for extricating myself from it.

Faust struck a chord in me and pierced me through in a way that I could not but regard as personal.

Most of all, it awakened in me the problem of opposites, of good and evil, of mind and matter, of light and darkness, Faust, the inept, purblind philosopher, encounters the dark side of his being, his sinister shadow, Mephistopheles, who in spite of his negating disposition represents the true spirit of life as against the arid scholar who hovers on the brink of suicide.

My own inner contradictions appeared here in dramatized form; Goethe had written virtually a basic outline and pattern of my own conflicts and solutions.

The dichotomy of Faust-Mephistopheles came together within myself into a single person, and I was that person.

In other words, I was directly struck, and recognized that this was my fate.

Hence, all the crises of the drama affected me personally; at one point I had passionately to agree, at another to oppose.

No solution could be a matter of indifference to me.

Later I consciously linked my work to what Faust had passed over: respect for the eternal rights of man, recognition of "the ancient," and the continuity of culture and intellectual history.

Our souls as well as our bodies are composed of individual elements which were all already present in the ranks of our ancestors.

The "newness" in the individual psyche is an endlessly varied recombination of age-old components.

Body and soul therefore have an intensely historical character and find no proper place in what is new, in things that have just come into being.

That is to say, our ancestral components are only partly at home in such things.

We are very far from having finished completely with the Middle Ages, classical antiquity, and primitivity, as our modern psyches pretend.

Nevertheless, we have plunged down a cataract of progress which sweeps us on into the future with ever wilder violence the farther it takes us from our roots.

Once the past has been breached, it is usually annihilated, and there is no stopping the forward motion.

But it is precisely the loss of connection with the past, our uprootedness, which has given rise to the "discontents" of civilization and to such a flurry and haste that we live more in the future and its chimerical promises of a golden age than in the present, with which our whole evolutionary background has not yet caught up.

We rush impetuously into novelty, driven by a mounting sense of insufficiency, dissatisfaction, and restlessness.

We no longer live on what we have, but on promises, no longer in the light of the present day, but in the darkness of the future, which, we expect, will at last bring the proper sunrise.

We refuse to recognize that everything better is purchased at the price of something worse; that, for example, the hope of greater freedom is canceled out by increased enslavement to the state, not to speak of the terrible perils to which the most brilliant discoveries of science expose us.

The less we understand of what our fathers and forefathers sought, the less we understand ourselves, and thus we help with all our might to rob the individual of his roots and his guiding instincts, so that he becomes a particle in the mass, ruled only by what Nietzsche called the spirit of gravity.

Reforms by advances, that is, by new methods or gadgets, are of course impressive at first, but in the long run they are dubious and in any case dearly paid for.

They by no means increase the contentment or happiness of people on the whole.

Mostly, they are deceptive sweetenings of existence, like speedier communications which unpleasantly accelerate the tempo of life and leave us with less time than ever before.

Omnis festinatio ex parte diaboli est all haste is of the devil, as the old masters used to say.

Reforms by retrogressions, on die other hand, are as a rule less expensive and in addition more lasting, for they return to the simpler, tried and tested ways of the past and make the sparsest use of newspapers, radio, television, and all supposedly timesaving innovations.

In this book I have devoted considerable space to my subjective view of the world, which, however, is, not a product of rational thinking.

It is rather a vision such as will come to one who undertakes, deliberately, with half-closed eyes and somewhat closed ears, to see and hear the form and voice of being.

If our impressions are too distinct, we are held to the hour and minute of the present and have no way of knowing how our ancestral psyches listen to and understand the present in other words, how our unconscious is responding to it.

Thus we remain ignorant of whether our ancestral components find an elementary gratification in our lives, or whether they are repelled.

Inner peace and contentment depend in large measure upon whether or not the historical family which is inherent in the individual can be harmonized with the ephemeral conditions of the present.

In the Tower at Bollingen it is as if one lived in many centuries simultaneously.

The place will outlive me, and in its location and style it points backward to things of long ago.

There is very little about it to suggest the present.

If a man of the sixteenth century were to move into the house, only the kerosene lamp and the matches would be new to him; otherwise, he would know his way about without difficulty.

There is nothing to disturb the dead, neither electric light nor telephone.

Moreover, my ancestors’ souls are sustained by the atmosphere of the house, since I answer for them the questions that their lives once left behind.

I carve out rough answers as best I can.

I have even drawn them on the walls.

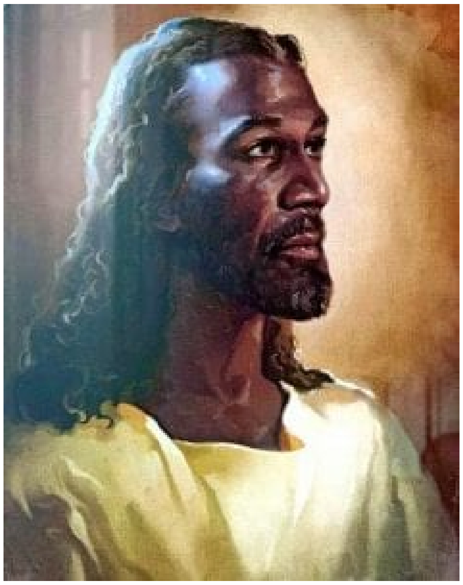
Carl Jung: ...the next savior might be a coloured man... (2019-06-17 05:28)



To Robert Edmond Jones

My dear Jonah, 6 January 1931

Thank you very much for sending me a copy of the wonderful book.

Having read OZ' Man Adam and his Chillun I was quite able to appreciate the particular beauty of the play and of your share in it.

I wish we could see such a thing over here.

But, alas, it is not even to be seen in England.

The censors there must be completely possessed by the devil.

No wonder, it is a piece of true religion.

I once said in the seminar it would be by no means impossible that the next savior might be a coloured man for the better humiliation of the white man's spiritual inflation.

Thank you again! My best wishes for a happy New Year.

Yours sincerely,

C.G. Jung

1 J. designed the set for Marc Connelly's play The Green Pastures. The play was based on Roark Bradford's stories of Negro life in the Deep South, Ol' Man Adam an' his Chillun (1928). Connelly's play opened in New York in Feb. 1930 and won the Pulitzer Prize for Drama, 1929/30.

2 The Lord Chamberlain, the Earl of Cromer, refused a license for a London production. Although no reason was given, the general impression was that exception was taken to the impersonation of God by a Negro.

Carl Jung: No Christian is meant to sleep in a safe pew... (2019-06-17 05:30)

No Christian is meant to sleep in a safe pew. . . . I have discovered in my private life that a true Christian is not bedded upon roses and he is not meant for peace and tranquility of mind but for war.

And again I am realizing profoundly that not everybody's nature is as bellicose as mine, although I have attained - Deo concedente - a certain state of peace within, paid for by a rather uncomfortable state of war without.

But even if a peaceful nature has reached a certain higher level of consciousness he cannot escape the raging conflict of opposites in his soul, as God wants to unite his opposites in man.

As soon as a more honest and complete consciousness beyond the collective has been established, man is no more an end in himself, but becomes an instrument of God, and this is really so and no joke about it. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 242.

Dr. Jung and the impressions ordinary people made upon him (2019-06-17 05:41)

I always remember a letter I received one morning, from a woman who wanted to see me just once in her life.

The letter made a very strong impression on me, I am not quite sure why. I invited her to come and she came.

She was very poor - poor intellectually too.

I don’t believe she had ever finished primary school.

She kept house for her brother; they ran a little newsstand.

I asked her kindly if she really understood my books which she said she had read. And she replied in this extraordinary way "Your books are not books, Herr Professor. They are bread."

And the little traveling salesman of women's things who stopped me in the street and looked at me with immense eyes, saying "Are you really the man who writes those books? Are you truly the one who writes about these things no one knows? C.G. Jung Speaking, Page 402.

Dr. Jung discusses Psychology and Physics with famous Physicists (2019-06-17 05:56)

Dear Professor Pauli,

Best thanks for kindly sending me Jordan's paper.

I think this paper should be published, as it is concerned with the Actual changeover of the physicist's mode of observation tothe psychological field.

This paper was inevitable.

Having come to the conclusion that the observed is also a disturbance by the observer, the consistent investigator of the unknown interior of the atom could not help seeing that the nature of the observing process becomes perceptible in the disturbance caused by the observation.

To put it more simply, if you look long enough into a dark hole you perceive what is looking in.

This is also the principle of cognition in yoga, which derives all cognition from the absolute emptiness of consciousness. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 174-175.

Dear Professor Jung,

The epistemological situation with regard to the concepts "conscious" and "unconscious" seems to offer a pretty close analogy to the "complementarity" situation in physics.

Every "observation of the unconscious," i.e., every conscious realization of unconscious contents, has an uncontrollable reactive effect on these same contents. . . . It is undeniable that the development of "microphysics" has brought the way in which nature is described in this science very much closer to that of the new psychology. Wolfgang Pauli, Last Years, Page 166.

Dear Professor Nelson:

The comparison of modern psychology to modern physics is no idle talk. Both disciplines have, for all their diametrical opposition, one most important point in common, namely the fact that they both approach the hitherto "transcendental" region of the Invisible and Intangible, the world of merely analogous thought. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 308.

[Carl Jung on if what he was doing was "Art." Oh, incidentally as a child Dr. Jung failed his "Drawing Class."]

While Jung was writing in Black Book 2, I said to myself "What is this I am doing, it certainly is not science, what is it?"

Then a voice said to me, "That is art."

This made the strangest sort of impression upon me, because it was not in any sense my impression that what I was writing was art.

Then I came to this, "Perhaps my unconscious is forming a personality that is not 1, but which is insisting on coming through to expression."

I don’t know why exactly, but I knew to a certainty that the voice that had said my writing was art had come from a woman ... Well I said very emphatically to this voice that what I was doing was not art, and I felt a great resistance grow up within me.

No voice came" through, however, and I kept on writing. This time I caught her and said, "No it is not," and I felt as though an argument would ensue.

He thought that this voice was "the soul in the primitive sense," which he called the anima (the Latin word for soul).

He stated that "In putting down all this material for analysis, I was in effect writing letters to my anima, that is part of myself with a different viewpoint from my own.

I got remarks of a new character-I was in analysis with a ghost and a woman."

In retrospect, he recalled that this was the voice of a Dutch patient whom he knew from 1912 to 1918, who had persuaded a psychiatrist colleague that he was a misunderstood artist.

The woman had thought that the unconscious was art, but Jung had maintained that it was nature.

I have previously argued that the woman in question-the only Dutch woman in Jung’s circle at this time-was Maria Moltzer, and that the psychiatrist in question was Jung’s friend and colleague Franz Riklin, who increasingly forsook analysis for painting.

In 1913, he became a student of Augusto Giacometti’s, the uncle of Alberto Giacometti, and an important early abstract painter in his own right. The Red Book, Introduction, Page 199.

Note: It is somewhat Ironic that Dr. Jung who painted such brilliant works of Art as found in "The Red Book" failed "Drawing Class" as a child.

Carl Jung; Meister Eckhart’s theology knows a "Godhead" of which no qualities, except unity and being...

Meister Eckhart’s theology knows a "Godhead" of which no qualities, except unity and being, can be predicated; it "is becoming," it is not yet Lord of itself, and it represents an absolute coincidence of opposites: "But its simple nature is of forms formless; of becoming becomingless; of beings beingless; of things thingless," etc.

Union of opposites is equivalent to unconsciousness, so far as human logic goes, for consciousness presupposes a differentiation into subject and object and a relation between them.

Where there is no "other," or it does not yet exist, all possibility of consciousness ceases.

Only the Father, the God "welling" out of the Godhead, "notices himself," becomes "beknown to himself," and "confronts himself as a Person."

So, from the Father, comes the Son, as the Father’s thought of his own being.

In his original unity "he knows nothing" except the "suprareal" One which he is.

As the Godhead is essentially unconscious, 29 so too is the man who lives in God.

In his sermon on "The Poor in Spirit" (Matt. 5 : 3), the Meister says: "The man who has this poverty has everything he was when he lived not in any wise, neither in himself, nor in truth, nor in God.

He is so quit and empty of all knowing that no knowledge of God is alive in him; for while he stood in the eternal nature of God, there lived in him not another: what lived there was himself.

And so we say this man is as empty of his own knowledge as he was when he was not anything; he lets God work what he will, and he stands empty as when he came from God."

Therefore he should love God in the following way: "Love him as he is: a not-God, a not-spirit, a not-person, a not-image; as a sheer, pure, clear One, which he is, sundered from all secondness; and in this One let us sink eternally, from nothing to nothing.

So help us God. Amen."

The world-embracing spirit of Meister Eckhart knew, without discursive knowledge, the primordial mystical experience of India as well as of the Gnostics, and was itself the finest flower on the tree of the "Free Spirit" that flourished at the beginning of the eleventh century.

Well might the writings of this Master lie buried for six hundred years, for "his time was not yet come."

Only in the nineteenth century did he find a public at all capable of appreciating the grandeur of his mind.

These utterances on the nature of the Deity express transformations of the God-image which run parallel with changes in human consciousness, though one would be at a loss to say which is the cause of the other.

The God-image is not something invented, it is an experience that conies upon man spontaneously as anyone can see for himself unless he is blinded to the truth by theories and prejudices.

The unconscious God-image can therefore alter the state of consciousness, just as the latter can modify the God-image once it has become conscious.

This, obviously, has nothing to do with the "prime truth," the unknown God at least, nothing that could be verified.

Psychologically, however, the idea of God's ayvwcria, or of the avewoijTo* 0eos, is of the utmost importance, because it identifies the Deity with the numinosity of the unconscious. The atman-purusha philosophy of the East and, as we have seen, Meister Eckhart in the West both bear witness to this. Carl Jung; Aion; Pages 193-194; Para 301-303.

When I was writing down these fantasies, I once asked myself, ’What am I really doing? Certainly this has nothing to do with science. But then what is it?"

Whereupon a voice within me said, "It is art."

I was astonished. It had never entered my head that what I was writing had any connection with art.

Then I thought, "Perhaps my unconscious is forming a personality that is not me, but which is insisting on coming through to expression."

I knew for a certainty that the voice had come from a woman. I recognized it as the voice of a patient, a talented psychopath who had a strong transference to me.

She had become a living figure within my mind.

Obviously what I was doing wasn’t science.

What then could it be but art? It was as though these were the only alternatives in the world. That is the way a woman’s mind works.

I said very emphatically to this voice that my fantasies had nothing to do with art, and I felt a great inner resistance.

No voice came through, however, and I kept on writing.

Then came the next assault, and again the same assertion: "That is art."

This time I caught her and said, "No, it is not art!

On the contrary, it is nature/* and prepared myself for an argument.

When nothing of the sort occurred, I reflected that the "woman within me" did not have the speech centers I had.

And so I suggested that she use mine.

She did so and came through with a long statement.

I was greatly intrigued by the fact that a woman should interfere with me from within.

My conclusion was that she must be the "soul” in the primitive sense, and I began to speculate on the reasons why the name "anima" was given to the soul.

Why was it thought of as feminine?

Later I came to see that this inner feminine figure plays a typical, or archetypal, role in the unconscious of a man, and I called her the "anima."

The corresponding figure in the unconscious of woman I called the "animus."

At first it was the negative aspect of the anima that most impressed me. I felt a little awed by her.

It was like the feeling of an invisible presence in the room.

Then a new idea came to me: in putting down all this material for analysis I was in effect writing letters to the anima, that is, to a part of myself with a different viewpoint from my conscious one.

I got remarks of an unusual and unexpected character.

I was like a patient in analysis with a ghost and a woman!

Every evening I wrote very conscientiously, for I thought if I did not write, there would be no way for the anima to get at my fantasies.

Also, by writing them out I gave her no chance to twist them into intrigues.

There is a tremendous difference between intending to tell something and actually telling it.

In order to be as honest as possible with myself, I wrote everything down very carefully, following the old Greek maxim: "Give away all that thou hast, then shalt thou receive."

Often, as I was writing, I would have peculiar reactions that threw me off.

Slowly I learned to distinguish between myself and the interruption.

When something emotionally vulgar or banal came up, I would say to myself, "It is perfectly true that I have thought and felt this way at some time or other, but I don't have to think and feel that way now.

I need not accept this banality of mine in perpetuity; that is an unnecessary humiliation.

The essential thing is to differentiate oneself from these unconscious contents by personifying them, and at the same time to bring them into relationship with consciousness.

That is the technique for stripping them of their power.

It is not too difficult to personify them, as they always possess a certain degree of autonomy, a separate identity of their own.

Their autonomy is a most uncomfortable thing to reconcile oneself to, and yet the very fact that the unconscious presents itself in that way gives us the best means of handling it.

What the anima said seemed to me full of a deep cunning.

If I had taken these fantasies of the unconscious as art, they would have carried no more conviction than visual perceptions, as if I were watching a movie.

I would have felt no moral obligation toward them.

The anima might then have easily seduced me into believing that I was a misunderstood artist, and that my so-called artistic nature gave me the right to neglect reality.

If I had followed her voice, she would in all probability have said to me one day, "Do you imagine the nonsense you're engaged in is really art? Not a bit."

Thus the insinuations of the anima, the mouthpiece of the unconscious, can utterly destroy a man.

In the final analysis the decisive factor is always consciousness, which can understand the manifestations of the unconscious and take up a position toward them.

But the anima has a positive aspect as well. It is she who communicates the images of the unconscious to the conscious mind, and that is what I chiefly valued her for.

For decades I always turned to the anima when I felt that my emotional behavior was disturbed, and that something had been constellated in the unconscious.

I would then ask the anima: "Now what are you up to? What do you see? I should like to know."

After some resistance she regularly produced an image.

As soon as the image was there, the unrest or the sense of oppression vanished.

The whole energy of these emotions was transformed into interest in and curiosity about the image.

I would speak with the anima about the images she communicated to me, for I had to try to understand them as best I could, just like a dream.

Today I no longer need these conversations with the anima, for I no longer have such emotions. But if I did have them, I would deal with them in the same way.

Today I am directly conscious of the anima's ideas because I have learned to accept the contents of the unconscious and to understand them.

I know how I must behave toward the inner images. I can read the meaning directly from my dreams, and therefore no longer need a mediator to communicate them. Carl Jung; Memories Dreams and Reflections; Pages 185-188.

Professor Jung: Yes, I always take the invention of writing as the criterion for when responsible consciousness came into existence. (2019-06-18 04:02)

Professor Jung:

Yes, I always take the invention of writing as the criterion for when responsible consciousness came into existence. That's a particular period in the development of consciousness itself, mind you.
We must completely abandon the idea of finding out when that began. That goes back to God knows when.

But we may say that the beginning of writing shows the moment when reflection began.

No other consciousness can justifiably be called human.

There is an element in reflection, a divine element, so to speak, that elevates at least part of the human being out of the general "natural soup." When can we date that beginning?

Participant: In the Age of Taurus 4500 B.C.

Professor Jung: The oldest written monuments date back to 4200-4100 BC.

The first texts in cuneiform writing and hieroglyphs are from about the same period.

Since then for about six thousand years, that is, we can speak of human consciousness.

One may think that this isn't such an enormous period of time.

It is a relatively short span in the whole history of mankind. Se we may say that we have come quite a considerable distance.

But in view of what is perhaps still possible, very little.

So if someone should say that our consciousness has not gotten anywhere yet, he may be right. In any case, I see infinite possibilities for human consciousness.

We always think we have reached a certain level, but we are nowhere near the summit yet.

So I would say that the unconscious constitutes the greater part. Interpretation of Dreams Ancient and Modern, Chapter VI, Page 236.

Image: Letter sent by the high-priest Lu'enna to the king of Lagash (maybe Urukagina), informing him of his son's death in combat, c. 2400 BC, found in Telloh (ancient Girsu).

[Note: For those familiar with "The Red Book" great correspondences in the material contained in "Interpretation of Dreams Ancient and Modern" may be found in "The Red Book."

For example:

When the month of the Twins had ended, the men said to their shadows: "You are I," since they had previously had their spirit around them as a second person.

Thus the two became one, and through this collision the formidable broke out, precisely that spring of consciousness that one calls culture and which lasted until the time of Christ.

But the fish indicated the moment when what was united split, according to the eternal law of contrasts, into an underworld and upper world.

If the power of growth begins to cease, then the united falls into its opposites. Christ sent what is beneath to Hell, since it strives toward the good. That had to be.

But the separated cannot remain separated forever. It will be united again and the month of the fish will soon be over.

We suspect and understand that growth needs both, and hence we keep good and evil close together. Because we know that too far into the good means the same as too far into evil, we keep them both together. Carl Jung; The Red Book; Pages 314-315.]

Carl Jung: You cannot make recipes out of psychoanalysis! (2019-06-18 04:30)

From Dr. Loy 9 February 1913

The same passion for truth possesses us when we think of pure research, and the same wish to cure when we consider therapy.

For the researcher, as for the doctor, we desire the fullest freedom in all directions—complete freedom to choose and practise the methods which promise the best fulfilment of their ends at any moment.

On this last point we are at one, but it remains a postulate which we must prove to the satisfaction of others if we want recognition for our views.

First and foremost there is one question that must be answered, an old question already asked in the Gospels: "What is truth?"

I think clear definitions of fundamental ideas are everywhere necessary.

How shall we contrive a working definition of the concept "Truth?"

Perhaps an allegory may help us.

Imagine a gigantic prism in front of the sun, so that its rays are broken up, but suppose man entirely ignorant of this fact. (I disregard the chemical, invisible, ultra-violet rays.)

Men living in the blue-lit region will say, "The sun sends forth blue light only."

They are right and yet they are wrong: from their standpoint they are capable of perceiving only a fragment of the truth.

And so too with the inhabitants of the red, yellow, and intermediate regions.

And they will all scourge and slay one another to force their fragmentary truth on the others—until, grown wiser through travelling in each other’s regions, they come to the unanimous view that the sun sends out light of different colours.

That is a more comprehensive truth, but it is still not the truth.

Only when a giant lens has recombined the split-up rays, and when the invisible, chemical, and heat rays have given proof of their specific effects, will a view arise more in accordance with the truth, and men will perceive that the sun emits white light which is split up by the prism into different rays with different qualities, and that these rays are recombined by the lens into a beam of white light.

This example serves to show that the road to Truth leads through a series of comparative observations, the results of which must be controlled with the help of freely selected experiments until seemingly well-grounded hypotheses and theories can be put forward; but these hypotheses and theories will fall to the ground as soon as a single new observation or a single new experiment contradicts them.

The way is toilsome, and in the end all we ever attain is a relative truth.

But such relative truth suffices for the time being if it serves to explain the most important concatenations of fact in the past, to light up those of the present, and to predict those of the future, so that we are in a position to adapt through our knowledge.

Absolute truth, however, would be accessible only to omniscience, having knowledge of all possible concatenations and combinations; but that is not possible for us, because the number of concatenations and combinations is infinite.

Accordingly, we shall never know more than an approximate truth.

Should new concatenations be discovered, new combinations be built up, the picture changes and with it the whole range of knowledge and action.

To what new revolutions in daily life does not every new scientific discovery lead: how absurdly small was the beginning of the first theory of electricity, how inconceivably great the results!

These are commonplaces, but one must continually repeat them when one sees how life is always made bitter for the innovators in every scientific field, and now especially so for the followers of the psychoanalytic school.

Everyone admits these commonplaces so long as it is a matter of "academic" discussion, but only so long; as soon as a concrete case has to be considered, sympathies and antipathies rush to the forefront and darken judgment.

Therefore the investigator must fight tirelessly, appealing to logic and honesty, for freedom of research in all fields, and must not allow despots of whatever political or religious persuasion to advance "reasons of expediency" in order to destroy or even restrict this freedom.

Reasons of expediency may be and are in place elsewhere, but not here.

Finally, we must make an end of the dictum of the Middle Ages, philosophia ancilla theologiae, as well as the founding of university chairs in favour of this or that political or religious party.

All fanaticism is the enemy of science, which above all things must be independent.

And when we turn from the search for Truth back to therapeutics, we see immediately that here again we are in agreement.

In practice expediency must rule: the doctor from the yellow region must adapt himself to the patients in the yellow region, as must the doctor in the blue region to his patients; both have the same object in view.

And the doctor who lives in the white light must take into consideration the past experiences of patients from the yellow or blue region, in spite or rather because of his wider knowledge.

In such cases the way to healing will be long and difficult, may indeed lead more easily to a cul-de-sac than in cases where he has to deal with patients who, like himself, have already attained knowledge of the white light, or, in other words, when his patients have already "sorted themselves out."

With these sorted-out patients the psychoanalyst is permitted to work exclusively with the methods of psychoanalysis; he can consider himself lucky that he does not need to "play the augur."

Now, these methods of psychoanalysis, what are they?

If I understand you aright, it is by and large a question of working directly and openly with the fundamental forces of the human psyche, to the end that the patient, be he sick or sound or in some stage in between—for sickness and health flow into each other imperceptibly—shall have his mental eyes opened to the drama that is being enacted within him.

He must learn to know the automatisms that are hostile to the development of his personality, and through this knowledge he must learn gradually to free himself from them; but he must also learn how to exploit and strengthen the favourable automatisms.

He must learn to make his self-knowledge real and to control the workings of his mind so that a balance may be struck between feeling and reason.

How large a part is played in all this by suggestion } I can hardly believe that suggestion can be avoided altogether till the patient feels really freed.

This freedom, it goes without saying, is the main thing to strive for, and it must be an active freedom.

The patient who simply obeys a suggestion obeys it only so long as the ”transference to the analyst" remains in force.

But in order to adjust himself to all circumstances the patient must have strengthened himself "from within."

He should no longer need the crutches of faith but must be capable of tackling all theoretical and practical problems critically and of solving them himself.

That is your view, isn’t it, or have I not understood you correctly?

I next ask, must not every single case be treated differently —within the limits of the psychoanalytic method?

For if every case is a case by itself, it must surely require individual treatment.

"Il n’y a pas de maladies, il n’y a que des malades," said a French doctor whose name escapes me.

But broadly speaking, what course, from a technical point of view, does analysis take, and what deviations occur most frequently?

That I would gladly learn from you. I take it for granted that all "augur’s tricks," darkened rooms, masks, chloroform, etc., are out of the question.

Psychoanalysis—purged so far as is humanly possible of suggestive influence—appears to have one essential difference from psychotherapy a la Dubois.

With Dubois, all talk about the past is prohibited from the outset, and "moral reasons for recovery" are placed in the forefront; whilst psychoanalysis uses the subconscious material from the patient’s past and present to promote self-knowledge.

Another difference lies in the conception of morality: morals are above all ’ ’relative."

But what forms (in broad outline) should one give them at times when suggestion cannot be avoided? Expediency must decide, you will say.

Agreed, as regards old people or grown-ups who have to live in a not very enlightened milieu.

But if one is dealing with children, the seed of the future, isn’t it a sacred duty to enlighten them about the shaky foundations of the so-called moral conceptions of the past, which have only a dogmatic basis, and to educate them to full freedom by courageously unveiling the truth?

I ask this not so much with respect to the analysing doctor as with respect to the educator.

Should not the founding of progressive schools be regarded as a task for the psychoanalyst?

From Dr. Jung 11 February 1913

The relativity of "truth" has been known for ages and does not stand in the way of anything, and if it did would merely prevent belief in dogmas and authority.

But it does not even do that.

You ask me—or rather tell me—what psychoanalysis is.

Before considering your views, permit me first to try to mark out the territory and give a definition of psychoanalysis.

Psychoanalysis is first of all simply a method—but a method complying with all the rigorous requirements which the concept of a "method" implies today.

Let me say at once that psychoanalysis is not an anamnesis, as those who know everything without learning it are pleased to believe.

It is essentially a way of investigating unconscious associations which cannot be got at by exploring the conscious mind.

Again, psychoanalysis is not a method of examination in the nature of an intelligence test, though this mistake is common in certain circles.

Nor is it a method of catharsis for abreacting, with or without hypnosis, real or imaginary traumata.

Psychoanalysis is a method which makes possible the analytical reduction of psychic contents to their simplest expression, and for discovering the line of least resistance in the development of a harmonious personality.

In neurosis there is no uniform direction of life because contrary tendencies frustrate and prevent psychological adaptation.

Psychoanalysis, so far as we can judge at present, seems to be the only rational therapy of the neuroses.

No programme can be formulated for the technical application of psychoanalysis.

There are only general principles, and working rules for individual analysis. (For the latter I would refer you to Freud's work in Vol. I of the Internationale Zeitscrift fur drztliche Psychoanalyse?)

My only working rule is to conduct the analysis as a perfectly ordinary, sensible conversation, and to avoid all appearance of medical magic.

The main principle of psychoanalytic technique is to analyse the psychic contents that present themselves at a given moment.

Any interference on the part of the analyst, with the object of forcing the analysis to follow a systematic course, is a gross mistake in technique.

So-called chance is the law and order of psychoanalysis.

At the beginning of the analysis the anamnesis and diagnosis naturally come first.

The subsequent analytic procedure develops quite differently in every case.

To give rules is almost impossible.

All one can say is that very frequently, right at the beginning, a number of resistances have to be overcome, resistances against both the method and the analyst.

Patients who have no notion of psychoanalysis must first be given some understanding of the method.

With those who already know something of it there are very often misconceptions to be set right, and also all those objections to be answered which are levelled by scientific criticism.

In either case the misconceptions are due to arbitrary interpretations, superficiality, and gross ignorance of the facts.

If the patient is himself a doctor his habit of knowing better may prove extremely tiresome.

With intelligent colleagues a thorough theoretical discussion is worth while.

With the unintelligent and bigoted ones you begin quietly with the analysis.

In the unconscious of such folk you have a confederate who never lets you down.

The very first dreams demonstrate the wretched inadequacy of their criticism, so that from the whole beautiful edifice of supposedly scientific scepticism nothing remains over but a little heap of personal vanity.

I have had very amusing experiences in this respect.

It is best to let the patients talk freely and to confine yourself to pointing out a connection here and there.

When the conscious material is exhausted you go on to dreams, which give you the subliminal material.

If people have no dreams, as they allege, or forget them, there is usually still some conscious material that ought to be produced and discussed, but is kept back owing to resistances.

When the conscious is emptied then come the dreams, which as you know are the chief object of analysis.

How the analysis is to be conducted and what is to be said to the patient depends, first, on the material to be dealt with; second, on the analyst's skill; and third, on the patient's capacity.

I must emphasize that no one should undertake an analysis except on the basis of a sound knowledge of the subject, and this means a thorough knowledge of the existing literature.

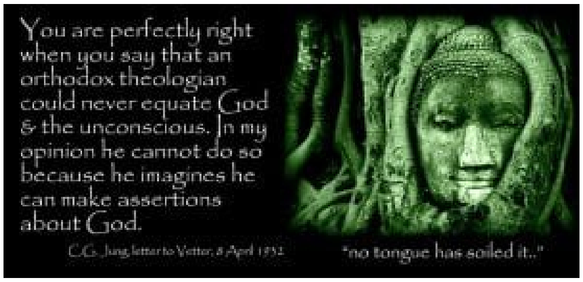
Without this, the work will only be bungled.

I do not know what else to tell you beforehand. I must wait for further questions.

As to the question of morality and education, let me say that these things belong to a later stage of the analysis, when they find—or should find—their own solution.

You cannot make recipes out of psychoanalysis! Loy/Jung Letters, CW 4, Para 608-631

Carl Jung: The Mother is, I maintain, only one aspect of the unconscious (2019-06-18 05:07)



You are perfectly right when you say that an orthodox theologian could never equate God & the unconscious. In my opinion he cannot do so because he imagines he can make assertions about God.

C.G. Jung, letter to Vetter, 8 April 1932

"no tongue has soiled it.."

Dear Dr. Vetter, 8 April 1932

The chief difficulty seems to be the concept of transcendence.

For me this concept is only epistemological, but for you, if I understand you correctly, it is something almost theological. Cf. the Christian concept of the Trinity, resulting from the efforts of the old theologians to push God out of the sphere of psychic experience into the Absolute.

We all know that this was done for the (necessary) purpose of bolstering up the authority of the Church against continual erosion by Gnosis and heresy.

Thus man was most effectively separated from God and the intercession of Ecclesia Mater became unavoidable.

It is in fact the great achievement of Protestantism that this transcendence, in practice at least, came a cropper.

Actually it is not correct to say that there is no mother goddess in the Christian Trinity.

The mother is simply veiled by the Holy Ghost (Sophia), which is the connecting link between Father and Son.

It is the breath that moves to and fro between them, according to the Catholic view.

This veiling of the mother (for the reasons mentioned above) had the result that the mother then appeared in an all the more concrete and authoritarian form as Ecclesia.

You are perfectly right when you say that an orthodox theologian could never equate God and the unconscious.

In my opinion he cannot do so because he imagines he can make assertions about God.

I don’t imagine I can, so that it doesn’t matter to me in the slightest whether God and the unconscious are ultimately identical or not.

The mother is, I maintain, only one aspect of the unconscious.

There is also a father aspect, though I wouldn’t attribute to these aspects more than a necessary illusionary character, due to the mental difficulty of conceiving anything that is not concrete and the incapacity of our language to express anything that is not a verbal image.

In a certain sense I could say of the collective unconscious exactly what Kant said of the Ding an sich-that it is merely a negative borderline concept, which however cannot prevent us from framing . . .1 or hypotheses about its possible nature as though it were an object of human experience.

But we do not know whether the unconscious an sich is unlimited, whether it is experienceable in part or not at all.

It could be absolute, i.e., inexperienceable.

At all events it is absolutely necessary for us to give up the anthropomorphism of the Christian concept of transcendence if we do not want to commit flagrant transgressions.

I grant you that I am on the best way to delivering up the Christian concept of the spirit to the chaos of Gnosis again, from which it was so carefully insulated.

But in my view the spirit is alive only when it is an adventure eternally renewed.

As soon as it is held fast it is nothing but a man-made expression of a particular cultural form.

Of course the cultural form owes its very existence to the intervention of a true and living spirit, but once it is fixed it has long ceased to be.

In my view the woolliness of our present-day thinking comes from our illegitimately granting it prerogatives which appear to endow thinking with faculties it doesn’t really possess.

Hence my function theory.

I hope we can meet again sometime and that we can then [continue] our discussion by word of mouth.

Christianity itself would never have spread through the pagan world with such astonishing rapidity, had its ideas not found an analogous psychic readiness to receive them. Carl Jung, CW 11, Answer to Job, Page 441.

But in omniscience there had existed from all eternity a knowledge of the human nature of God or the divine nature of man. This realization is a millennial process. Carl Jung, CW 11, Answer to Job, Page 402.

Carl Jung: …even the enlightened person remains what he is… (2019-06-18 05:28)

The Christian Church has hitherto. . . [recognized] Christ as the one and only God-man.

But the indwelling of the Holy Ghost, the third Divine Person, in man, brings about a Christification of many, and the question then arises whether these many are all complete God-men. . . .

It is well to remind ourselves of St. Paul and his split consciousness: on one side he felt he was the apostle directly called and enlightened by God, and, on the other side, a sinful man who could not pluck out the "thorn in the flesh" and rid himself of the Satanic angel who plagued him.

That is to say even the enlightened person remains what he is, and is never more than his own limited ego before the One who dwells within him, whose form has no knowable boundaries, who encompasses him on all sides, fathomless as the abysms of the earth and vast as the sky. Carl Jung on "Noise" - Anthology (2019-06-18 05:28)

I personally detest noise and flee it whenever and wherever possible, because it not only disturbs the concentration needed for my work but forces me to make the additional psychic effort of shutting it out. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 387-392.

Noise is certainly only one of the evils of our time, though perhaps the most obtrusive. The others are the gramophone, the radio, and now the blight of television. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 387-392.

The alarming pollution of our water supplies, the steady increase of radioactivity, and the sombre threat of overpopulation with its genocidal tendencies have already led to a widespread though not generally conscious fear which loves noise because it stops the fear from being heard. Noise is welcome because it drowns the inner instinctive warning. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 387-392.
Noise protects us from painful reflection, it scatters our anxious dreams, it assures us that we are all in the same boat and creating such a racket that nobody will dare to attack us. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 387-392.

Noise is so insistent, so overwhelmingly real, that everything else becomes a pale phantom. It relieves us of the effort to say or do anything, for the very air reverberates with the invincible power of our modernity. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 387-392.

There are far more people than one supposes who are not disturbed by noise, for they have nothing in them that could be disturbed; on the contrary, noise gives them something to live for. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 387-392.

The man who is only wise and only holy interests me about as much as the skeleton of a rare saurian, which would not move me to tears. The insane contradiction, on the other hand, between existence beyond Maya in the cosmic Self, and that amiable human weakness which fruitfully sinks many roots into the black earth, repeating for all eternity the weaving and rending of the veil as the ageless melody of India—this contradiction fascinates me; for how else can one perceive the light without the shadow, hear the silence without the noise, attain wisdom without foolishness? Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 953

I am alone, but I fill my solitariness with my life. I am man enough. I am noise, conversation, comfort, and help enough unto myself. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 277

The sensitiveness to noise persists. I always seek silence. I am a bundle of opposites and can only endure myself when I observe myself as an objective phenomenon. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 78.

A "scream" is always just that - a noise and not music. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 107.

I see with regret from your letter that you are suffering very much from your noises in the ear. The unconscious often uses symptoms of this kind in order to make psychic contents audible, i.e., the symptoms are intensified by a psychogenic afflux and only then do they acquire the proper tormenting character that forces your attention inwards, where of course it gets caught in the disturbing noises. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 20-21.

Some of the main islands [of peace] are: my garden, the view of distant mountains, my country place where I withdraw from the noise of city life, my library. Also small things like books, pictures, and stones. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 40.

Carl Jung on "Goethe" - Anthology (2019-06-18 05:33)

The problem of my destiny goes back a hundred and fifty years. Indeed it appeared as early as the twelfth century, as I have now discovered. Formerly I believed it only went back to Goethe's Faust. (Jung now told the dream of his ancestors in which the last was only able to move his little finger.) The problem that appeared as a question in the twelfth century became my extremely personal destiny. Already Goethe had found an answer a hundred and fifty years ago. My father was so tormented by it that he died at the age of fifty-four. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Page 67.

Biographies should show people in their undershirts. Goethe had his weaknesses, and Calvin was often cruel. Considerations of this kind reveal the true greatness of a man. This way of looking at things is better than false hero worship! Carl Jung, C.G. Jung Speaking, Page 165.

Beyond that I have had experiences which are, so to speak, "ineffable," "secret" because they can never be told properly and because nobody can understand them (I don't know whether I have even approximately understood them myself), "dangerous" because 99 % of humanity would declare I was mad if they heard such things from me, "catastrophic" because the prejudices aroused by their telling might block other people's way to a living and wondrous mystery, "taboo" because they are "Holy" protected by "Fear of the Gods" as faithfully described by Goethe:

Shelter gives deep cave.
Lions around us stray,
Silent and tame they rove, And sacred honors pay To the holy shrine of love. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 140-142.

Faust II has been my companion all my life but it was only 20 years ago that certain things began to dawn on me, especially when I read Christian Rosencreutz's Chymical Wedding, which Goethe also knew but, interestingly enough, did not mention among the alchemical literature of his Leipzig days. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 246-247.

So far as we know, Goethe used only the relatively late alchemical literature, and it was the study of the classical and early medieval texts which first convinced me that Faust I and II is an opus alchymicum in the best sense. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 246-247.

As in Goethe's Faust, here too it is the feminine element (Eve) that knows about the secret which can work against the total destruction of mankind, or man's despair in the face of such a development. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 386-387

Goethe's Faust almost reached the goal of classical alchemy, but unfortunately the ultimate coniunctio did not come off, so that Faust and Mephistopheles could not attain their oneness. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 453-454.

We must not forget that even Goethe is not the absolute authority but a human being who, as far as his unconscious is concerned, is just as small and impotent as any other insignificant person. Carl Jung, Jung-Schmid Correspondence, Pages 74-86

It was from the spirit of alchemy that Goethe wrought the figure of the "superman" Faust, and this superman led Nietzsche's Zarathustra to declare that God was dead and to proclaim the will to give birth to the superman, to "create a god for yourself out of your seven devils." Carl Jung, CW 13, Para 163.

It was from the spirit of alchemy that Goethe wrought the figure of the "superman" Faust, and this superman led Nietzsche's Zarathustra to declare that God was dead and to proclaim the will to give birth to the superman, to "create a god for yourself out of your seven devils." Carl Jung, CW 13, Para 163.

I would give the earth to know whether Goethe himself knew why he called the two old people "Philemon" and "Baucis." Carl Jung, Letters Vol. I, Pages 309-310

Goethe's Faust aptly says: "in the beginning was the deed"." "Deeds" were never invented, they were done; thoughts, on the other hand, are a relatively late discovery of man. First he was moved to deeds by unconscious factors; it was only a long time afterward that he began to reflect upon the causes that had moved him; and it took it him a very long time indeed to arrive at the preposterous idea that he must have moved himself . . . his mind being unable to identify any other motivating force than his own. Carl Jung; Man and His Symbols; Page 70.

"All that is outside, also is inside," we could say with Goethe. But this "inside," which modern rationalism is so eager to derive from "outside," has an a priori structure of its own that antedates all conscious experience. It is quite impossible to conceive how "experience" in the widest sense, or, for that matter, anything psychic, could originate exclusively in the outside world. The psyche is part of the inmost mystery of life, and it has its own peculiar structure and form like every other organism. Whether this psychic structure and its elements, the archetypes, ever "originated" at all is a metaphysical question and therefore unanswerable. The structure is something given, the precondition that is found to be present in every case. And this is the mother, the matrix—the form into which all experience is poured. Carl Jung, CW 9i, Pages 101-102

Medieval alchemy prepared the way for the greatest intervention in the divine world order that man has ever attempted alchemy was the dawn of the scientific age, when the daemon of the scientific spirit compelled the forces of nature to serve man to an extent that had never been known before. It was from the spirit of alchemy that Goethe wrought the figure of the "superman" Faust, and this superman led Nietzsche's Zarathustra to declare that God was dead and to proclaim the will to give birth to the superman, to "create a god for yourself out of your seven devils." Here we find the true roots, the preparatory processes deep in the psyche, which unleashed the forces at work in the world today. Science and technology have indeed conquered the world, but whether the psyche has gained anything is another matter. Carl Jung, CW 13, Para 163

The creative process has a feminine quality, and the creative work arises from unconscious depths—we might truly say from the realm of the Mothers. Whenever the creative force predominates, life is ruled and shaped by the unconscious rather than by the conscious will, and the ego is swept along on an underground current, becoming nothing more than a helpless observer of events. The progress of the work becomes the poet's fate and determines his psychology. It is not Goethe that creates Faust, but Faust that creates Goethe. And what is Faust } Faust is essentially a symbol. By this I do not mean that it is an allegory pointing to something all too familiar, but the expression of something profoundly alive in the soul of every German, which Goethe helped to bring to birth. Carl Jung, CW 15, Para159

Dante decks out his experience in all the imagery of heaven, purgatory, and hell; Goethe brings in the Blocksberg and the Greek underworld; Wagner needs the whole corpus of Nordic myth, including the Parsifal saga; Nietzsche resorts to the hieratic style of the bard and legendary seer; Blake presses into his service the phantasmagoric world of India, the Old Testament, and the Apocalypse; and Spitteler borrows old names for the new figures that pour in alarming profusion from his muse's cornucopia.

Everything to do with the masses is hateful to me. Anything popularized becomes common. Above all I would not disseminate Goethe, rather cook books. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 88-89.

Apart from a few poems, the only thing of Goethe's that is alive for me is Faust. For me this was always a study-for relaxation I prefer English novels. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 88-89.

Everything else of Goethe's pales beside Faust, although something immortal glitters in the poems too. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 88-89.

What one could "enjoy" of Goethe is, for me, too patriarchal, too much de l'epoque. What I value in Goethe I cannot "enjoy"; it is too big, too exciting, too profound. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 88-89.
It seems to me that one cannot meditate enough about Faust, for many of the mysteries of the second part are still unfathomed. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 88-89.

Carl Jung: What one could "enjoy" of Goethe is, for me, too patriarchal, too much de l'epoque. (2019-06-18 05:44)

To Max Rychner

Dear Dr. Rychner 28 February 1932

Here are my answers to your questions about Goethe:

1. My mother drew my attention to Faust when I was about 15 years old.

2. Goethe was important to me because of Faust.

3. As a "poet," perhaps Holderlin.

4. In my circle Faust is an object of lively interest. I once knew a wholesaler who always carried a pocket edition of Faust around with him.

Young people today try to be unhistorical. Goethe does not seem to mean much to them because, for them, he is too close to the fishy ideals of the 19th century.

Everything to do with the masses is hateful to me. Anything popularized becomes common. Above all I would not disseminate Goethe, rather cook books.

Apart from a few poems, the only thing of Goethe's that is alive for me is Faust. For me this was always a study-for relaxation I prefer English novels.

Everything else of Goethe's pales beside Faust, although something immortal glitters in the poems too.

What one could "enjoy" of Goethe is, for me, too patriarchal, too much de l'epoque. What I value in Goethe I cannot "enjoy"; it is too big, too exciting, too profound.

Faust is the most recent pillar in that bridge of the spirit which spans the morass of world history, beginning with the Gilgamesh epic,1 the I Ching,2 the Upanishads, the Tao-te Ching, the fragments of Heraclitus, and continuing in the Gospel of St. John, the letters of St. Paul, in Meister Eckhart and in Dante.

It seems to me that one cannot meditate enough about Faust, for many of the mysteries of the second part are still unfathomed.

Faust is out of this world and therefore it transports you; it is as much the future as the past and therefore the most living present.

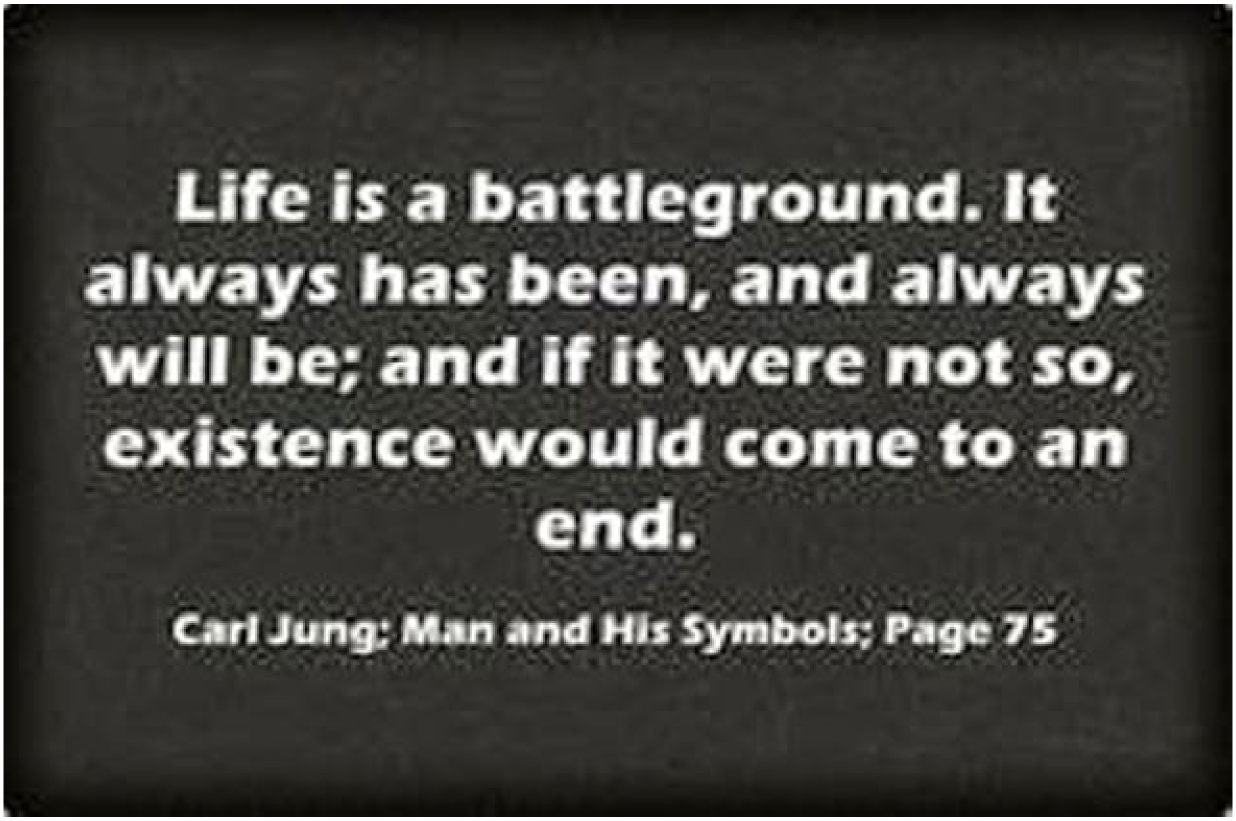
Hence everything that to me is essential in Goethe is contained in Faust.

Yours sincerely,

C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 88-89.

Carl Jung on Consciousness and Becoming Conscious (2019-06-19 02:23)

[1]



Life is a battleground. It always has been, and always will be; and if it were not so, existence would come to an end.

Carl Jung: Man and His Symbols; Page 75

Consciousness and Becoming Conscious Consciousness is the divine light; it is the possibility of seeing oneself, and this means to me that it is the very basis of life.

Consciousness is the transformation and the transformer of the primordial instinctual images.

The act of becoming conscious happens to man in darkness.

If he can grasp and handle consciousness then the fire brought from Heaven becomes a sacrificial flame, not the wrath of the gods.

The acquisition of consciousness by force creates a sense of guilt.

Consciousness is only possible if a spark of the essence becomes detached from the unconscious, religiously one could say from God.

Consciousness is obviously the supreme quality: the destiny of the world is to achieve entry into human consciousness.

Man is the being God has sought not only to show him the world, but because the Creator needs man to illuminate his creation.

We must become conscious for God because, through us, God becomes conscious and then becomes man.

We have to realize the inborn divine will, which is the process of individuation.

If I am all things I cannot discover anything.

I am a point that requires space and time to expand into consciousness.

If I am all things I cannot distinguish myself from the rest or recognize what is different from me.

Man is the dividing line of the acts of consciousness; he illuminates the night of the unconscious around him.

The actuality of things is a great puzzle.

What existed before and outside us? At a certain time a vast change must have taken place; yet even then, at that moment, the possibility of consciousness must already have been present in the world.

If a sudden separation occurs in the pleroma there arises the possibility of creation and consciousness.

In the completeness of the pleroma there is nothing to explain or distinguish because change and causality cease to exist there.

When we have achieved our greatest capacity for consciousness the task is to continue our efforts to carry into reality what we have learned.

In certain areas this cannot be done – I could not commit a murder, for instance.

With the contents of my consciousness I must live as naturally as a plant.

If I act inadequately it is the ape in me that does it.

The positive result of analysis enables us to become unconscious again.

Analysis is an intermezzo that lasts until the individual's greatest possible capacity for consciousness has been achieved.

Then he can return to nature and re-enter the dark current of life, practice Zen, or spend his time in alehouses.

Unfortunately the last possibility does not agree with my health!

We do not know our own role in life.

We behave like the lizard; we do what it does except that we also talk …

We approach life from the side of consciousness, but at certain times we have to make the sacrificium intellectus.

We must sacrifice everything and become again as a child; not to remain a child, be it understood, but to re-enter childhood.

This state implies a divinely transformed nature, a higher level of existence, and a more profound realization of the world.

The unconscious has first to be activated; then we must extricate ourselves, doubting all the things we have hitherto believed; then we can turn back and resume our place in the collective unconscious.

This higher consciousness must be re-integrated into the dark flow of life so that we see then only that, which is immediately before our eyes.

Even Goethe could only know a fraction of his possibilities and his destiny.

Mankind today is faced with problems that formerly concerned only the gods.

Man can now choose between total destructiveness and complete constructiveness.

These are superhuman possibilities.

The light of consciousness needs to be clearly distinguished from the cunning of the unfathomable depths of the spirit.

The psyche is emancipated from instinctual patterns and from causality. The psyche is also the scene of conflicts between instinct and free will, for instincts are without order and collide with the organised consciousness.

Europeans are especially likely to believe that they can replace instinct by intellect. Carl Jung; Conversations with C.G. Jung; Consciousness and becoming Conscious; Pages 9-13.

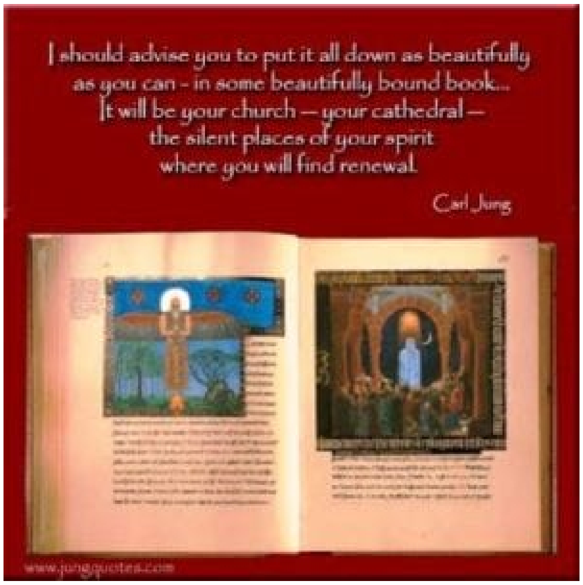
Carl Jung on the "Spirit of the Depths" [Red Book] - Anthology (2019-06-19 03:24)



I should advise you to put it all down as beautifully as you can - in some beautifully bound book...
It will be your church — your cathedral — the silent places of your spirit where you will find renewal.
Carl Jung
www.jungquotes.com

Everything that becomes too old becomes evil, the same is true of your highest. Learn from the suffering of the crucified God that one can also betray and crucify a God, namely the God of the old year. If a God ceases being the way the zenith, he must fall secretly. The God becomes sick if he oversteps the height of the zenith. That is why the spirit of the depths took me when the spirit of this time had led me to the summit. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 241.

From this we learn how the spirit of the depths considers the soul he sees her as a living and self-existing being, and with this he contradicts the spirit of this time for whom the soul is a thing dependent on man... Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 232.

Therefore the spirit of the depths forced me to speak to my soul, to call upon her as a living and self-existing being. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 232.

But one thing you must know: the one thing I have learned is that one must live this life. This life is the way, the long sought-after way to the unfathomable, which we call divine. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 232.

But the spirit of the depths said: "No one can or should halt sacrifice. Sacrifice is not destruction; sacrifice is the foundation stone of what is to come. Have you not had monasteries? Have not countless thousands gone into the desert? You should carry the monastery in yourself. The desert is within you. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 230.

The spirit of this time of course allowed me to believe in my reason. He let me see myself in the image of a leader with ripe thoughts. But the spirit of the depths teaches me that I am a servant, in fact the servant of a child: This dictum was repugnant to me and I hated it. But I had to recognize and accept that my soul is a child and that my God in my soul is a child. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 234.

The spirit of the depths took my understanding and all my knowledge and placed them at the service of the inexplicable and the paradoxical. He robbed me of speech and writing for everything that was not in his service, namely the melting together of sense and nonsense, which produces the supreme meaning. Carl Jung; The Red Book, Page 229

The spirit of this time has condemned us to haste. You have no more futurity and no more past if you serve the spirit of this time. We need the life of eternity. We bear the future and the past in the depths. The future is old and the past is young. You serve the spirit of this time, and believe that you are able to escape the spirit of the depths. But the depths do not hesitate any longer and will force you into the mysteries of Christ. It belongs to this mystery that man is not redeemed through the hero, but becomes a Christ himself. The antecedent example of the saints symbolically teaches us this. Carl Jung; The Red Book; Page 253.

But the spirit of the depths had gained this power, because I had spoken to my soul during 25 nights in the desert and I had given her all my love and submission. But during the 25 days, I gave all my love and submission to things, to men, and to the thoughts of this time. I went into the desert only at night. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 238.

In the renewed world you can have no outer possessions, unless you create them out of yourselves. You can enter only into your own mysteries. The spirit of the depths has other things to teach you than me. I only have to bring you tidings of the new God and of the ceremonies and mysteries of his service. But this is the way. It is the gate to darkness. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, "Draft" Footnote 163, Page 246.

The spirit of this time is ungodly; the spirit of the depths is ungodly; balance is godly. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 238.

The spirit of the depths is pregnant with ice, fire, and death. You are right to fear the spirit of the depths, as he is full of horror. You see in these days what the spirit of the depths bore. You did not believe it, but you would have known it if you had taken counsel with your fear. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 238.

You serve the spirit of this time, and believe that you are able to escape the spirit of the depths. But the depths do not hesitate any longer and will force you into the mysteries of Christ. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 253.

The God becomes sick if he oversteps the height of the zenith. That is why the spirit of the depths took me when the spirit of this time had led me to the summit. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 241.

When my prince had fallen, the spirit of the depths opened my vision and let me become aware of the birth of the new God. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Pages 243.

The spirit of the depths even taught me to consider my action and my decision as dependent on dreams. Dreams pave the way for life, and they determine you without you understanding their language. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 233

But I did not consider that the spirit of the depths from time immemorial and for all the future possesses a greater power than the spirit of this time, who changes with the generations. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 229

The spirit of the depths has subjugated all pride and arrogance to the power of judgment. He took away my belief in science, he robbed me of the joy of explaining and ordering things, and he let devotion to the ideals of this time die out in me. He forced me down to the last and simplest things. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page229

The spirit of the depths took my understanding and all my knowledge and placed them at the service of the Inexplicable and the paradoxical. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 229

Carl Jung on "Archetypes." (2019-06-19 03:25)

Archetypes

When all the archetypal images are properly placed in a hierarchy, when that which must be below is below, and that which must be above is above, our final condition can recapture our original blissful state.

Archetypes are images in the soul that represent the course of one's life. One part of the archetypal content is of material and the other of spiritual origin.

The more an archetype is amplified the more understandable it becomes.

It is hard to explain because the spiritual cannot be expressed in a few words.

The archetype signifies that particular spiritual reality which cannot be attained unless life is lived in consciousness. Archetypes are not matters of faith; we can know that they are there.

An archetype is composed of an instinctual factor and a spiritual image. The approaches to it from the instinctual or the spiritual side are very different.

The libido cannot be freed, however, unless the archetypal images can be made conscious.

When fantasy pictures are brought into consciousness their intrinsic energy is liberated.

In this way the instincts become integrated and ordered.

When only the instinctual element of the archetypal content is active there is chaos (massa confusa).

Archetypes can change whilst the individual remains quite unconscious of their movements.

Conceivable they change spontaneously. The archetypal content of dreams disappears and is replaced by a new one, even when the earlier form has not come into consciousness.

From the nature of a particular archetype it is possible to predict which will follow it.

It can be assumed that the flow of archetypes at a particular time characterize that historical period in a particular way.

The typical events of an era are determined by the succession and the quality of the corresponding archetypal images.

The succession of the archetypal motives is a collective development and has nothing to do with the individual.

We may imagine that the archetypes, being only the residual deposits of human experiences, would have represented animalistic life in an earlier period.

The archetypal primordial forms were already present, however, at the dawn of human consciousness; at its centre, everything was already there as an apriori possibility.

Even the first experiences of man were already fixed; we can only translate these patterns, these archetypes, into form we can understand.

Men have to realize the archetypes which are present at an unconscious level in creation.

All potentialities lie in the unconscious like ideas that have not yet been embodied nor experienced yet as reality.

The archetypes are present in the unconscious as potential abilities which, at a given moment, are realized and applied when brought into consciousness by a creative act.

As an analogy we can suppose that every inspiration produced out of the unconscious has a history.

A new situation occurs as a constellation produced by the archetype, a new inspiration emerges, and something else is discovered and becomes a part of reality.

A host of possibilities is still embedded in the archetypes, in the realm of the Mothers.

The abundance of possibilities eludes our comprehension.

The origin of the archetypes is a crucial question. Where space and time are relative it is not possible to speak of developments in time.

Everything is present, altogether and all at once, in the constant presence of the pleroma.

I remember standing on a mountain top in Kenya Africa, seeing around me an endless expanse of brush and herds of animals grazing, all in a deep silence as it had been for thousands of years without anyone being aware of it.

"They" were present but not consciously seen; they were as nameless as in Paradise before Adam named them.

Name-giving is an act of creation.

Where space and time do not exist there is only oneness (monofes). There is no differentiation; there is only pleroma.

Pleroma is always with us, under our feet and above our heads.

Man is the point that has become visible, stepping out from the pleroma, knowing what he is doing, and able to name the things about him.

Although the earth existed before there were any human beings, it could not be seen or known by anyone.

In China they say that the ancestor of the family, the one who stood at the beginning, is the Cosmos.

Out of him was everything created in the time before time.

There is nothing to explain or distinguish in the oneness because sequence and causality do not exist.

The archetypes are the material of the God- Creator.

The constitute a primeval ocean charged with potentiality. Carl Jung; Conversations with C.G. Jung, Archetypes, Pages 21-22.

Consciousness, no matter how extensive it may be, must always remain the smaller circle within the greater circle of the unconscious, an island surrounded by the sea; and, like the sea itself, the unconscious yields an endless and self-replenishing abundance of living creatures, a wealth beyond our fathoming.

~Carl Jung, CW 16, Para 366

Carl Jung on Psychotherapy (2019-06-19 05:23)

The Best Therapist
Has Fur and Four Legs

Psychotherapy

As therapists we are subject to the unavoidable destinies of our patients.

We can smooth their sharp edges, lead them, and help them to experience their true fate.

But many a tragic destiny cannot be averted.

Yes, we sometimes see a patient rushing towards disaster; we should help him then to immerse himself so that he can learn and, with our help, extricate himself again.

Many can only learn from experience and cannot be protected from the suffering such experience brings.

There are some who repeatedly fall into the same situation without realizing it.

Others come to know the dangers of their weaknesses and grow with the knowledge.

When similar problems arise they may be able to avoid them, but if it is their fate to fall into the same error again at least they know, "Oh,this is the situation where I failed before."

Then they are more in control of themselves and can be spectators instead of like a ball that is tossed about.

To know the danger is not as a rule enough to avoid making the mistake.

Life has to be lived. There are times of misfortune– certain illnesses and difficulties – through which we must pass.

A certain amount of suffering and unhappiness is our lot and no one can escape all the dark phases of life.

Consciousness of our problems does not protect us from misfortune, but at least consciousness is more helpful than unconsciousness.

Instinct can certainly help, a natural instinct being of course better than a warped one.

It is really far better to stand consciously in the midst of one's life – and it is undoubtedly easier.

It made sense to men in antiquity not to lead very vital lives, but for us it is right to live as fully as possible.

Life exists only where there is meaning; it does not matter what a person does provided it makes sense to him.

If one can help a person find meaning in his suffering and in his situation, either in the negative or the positive (i.e. archetypal) sense, then he can bear any conflict and any situation.

An understanding of the situation can come about immediately if its meaning is displayed in a dream.

When meaningfulness and vitality coincide the whole scale of values becomes oriented towards them.

Individuation cannot be achieved without a mystery.

The mysteries of antiquity were secrets created artificially for those who did not find any deep mystery in themselves.

As the importance of the inner life increased, the meaning of the public mysteries of antiquity decreased in value.

To own a mystery gives stature, conveys uniqueness, and assures that one will not be submerged in the mass.

Because a secret may cause suffering it is best to keep it to oneself.

The true art is in pond us et mesura -in the right balance of weight, measure and degree.

Too much secrecy causes neurosis and a split from reality, but having no mystery permits only collective thinking and action.

Mystery is essential to the experience of oneself as a unique personality, distinct from others, and for growth through repeated conflict.

There is no need to fear that analysis can destroy creative ability. That could only happen to a pseudo-artist.

There is nothing more strong and alive than the creative capacity; no system of thought can obstruct the creative urge.

Transference is the natural vehicle by which the patient regains courage.

We can only stand by ourselves if others are willing to stand by us.

The analyst's acceptance of the patient assures him that he can be borne and implies that he too can bear himself.

When the patient is accepted he often believes, in the early stages of analysis, that the analyst sanctions everything he does.

So he lets himself sink even lower because he believes that his behaviour is confirmed and that his dark side has also been accepted.

Christ himself associated with tax collectors and whores and accepted the thief crucified beside him.

I am the least of my brethren and my own shadow.

Even when we recognize that an erotic problem lies behind a neurosis we must not express it crudely lest we frighten the patient away.

We would then have destroyed the vehicle that could rescue him.

All of us reach our destinations travelling under false hypotheses.

Columbus wanted to sail to India and found he had discovered America.

To overcome transference all the Christian virtues are necessary: love, humility, sacrifice, good will.

Depressions always have to be understood teleologically.

An overweening extraversion is often present and the depression is directly useful in imposing a period of introversion.

I had a 56 year old manic depressive patient whom I would send unmercifully to bed whenever she became carping and irritable. In this way I could cut the depressive phase short.

If the unconscious does not cooperate, if, that is, there are no dreams or fantasies, then it is very difficult to deal with a neurosis. The analyst depends on some reaction from the unconscious.

The unconscious can also express itself through a depression.

People so spoilt by success that they are no longer accustomed to struggle for it, must sometimes suffer disaster in order to wake up: otherwise life is too easy for them.

They are too comfortable and they have to pay for it somehow.

Many are plagued by chronic ailments or intermittent depressions because fate does not torment them in other ways.

Chronic illness or depression is then directly meaningful.

They are mechanisms, to be sure, but so long as people are enslaved by these mechanisms they are saved from a more cruel fate.

There are some patients the analyst must even treat emotionally, and he must not allow certain other patients to exploit him.

He can talk very openly and sternly to these and even respond emotionally to them.

Such people enslave others. They must be shown that they have a desire to dominate: they must be told the truth.

People of this kind are subject to depression because they want to rule others but cannot manage to.

Even in rearing a child it is often good for parents to react emotionally and not with cool superiority to the child's bad behaviour.

Children often irritate their parents just to make them show emotion.

There are neurotics who work towards a situation in order to cause an explosion; then it may be possible to straighten them out and help them.

An American woman underwent a Freudian analysis without success.

She had used foul language to her analyst but he had failed to react and he disregarded her behaviour.

When she repeated some examples to me I told her in no uncertain terms that if she were ever to speak to me again like that, I would reply to her in the same fashion.

The patient pointed out that I had become emotional and that was not permissible for an analyst.

My answer was, " But it is human and I have the right to be human too." This allowed her to emerge from her schizophrenia.

She had become disoriented through the unnatural behaviour of her first analyst; she was brought back to reality by the honesty of my reaction and was cured.

If it is avoidable, the same analyst should not treat both, husband and wife.

Both patients desire to have their analyst on their side.

The analyst must at times agree with the patients even when they are being foolish so that they may experience the extent of their problem, but such an acceptance of foolishness can confuse the other spouse considerably.

Often people come for analysis who wish to be prepared to meet death.

They can make astonishingly good progress in a short time and then die peacefully.

Inner development can advance enormously if there is knowledge of the nearness of the end.

It seems as if a further step in consciousness has to be reached before the end of life.

Psychology is a preparation for death. We have an urge to leave life at a higher level than the one at which we entered.

After a stroke general debilitation or senile depression can occur.

If the brain is damaged,consciousness can slip back many levels.

The real personality has then departed; what remains carries on the fight against death.

Conflicts do not reach the whole person any more and are therefore not real conflicts any longer.

If the question of an abortion arises the whole situation with all its implications must be taken into account.

If the parents are married and healthy the child must be accepted, and the sacrifice of living a more modest life should be met if it is financially necessary.

If the parents are not married the question must be weighed very carefully: would it be favourable or not, damaging or useful?

It is wrong to brand sexuality as the main criterion of morality.

When some people have suppressed their own personality they have a tendency to put the personalities of others under pressure; this makes them fear their own nature.

There are patients who can accept neither the world nor themselves.

It is the task of the analyst to bear with them until they can bear themselves.

Everyone in the world is crying out to be accepted.

The analyst must pay the price for the damage done to his patients by others before him.

If someone is in great danger, perhaps a borderline case, it is of fundamental importance that the patient should realize his condition.

If the poles of the psyche are torn apart the analyst should take great care that the patient does not identify himself with one side of his conflict.

It is important to help to create a broad base for the patient to stand on.

He must increase his knowledge because knowledge protects.

The patient also needs to become more independent or the analyst will be blamed for his condition, especially if the patient clings too tightly to the analyst and leans exclusively on him.

Many would rather believe others than to their own thinking.

It is a fact that many who are cured would prefer to return to a condition of no responsibility.

The insane do not stop up their ears so as not to hear the inner voices; rather they do it to close off the outside and so be better able to hear their own voices.

I was once seriously threatened by a patient because he had,through his analysis, made it impossible for her to fall back into the old insane, irresponsible condition.

Because the alienated have lost something (their sense of reality in most cases) they have gained something else, something that seems real to them.

Through their abaissemental they have gained a realization of the world as it is, namely the world of the archetypes, the mundus archetypus.

Synchronous phenomena can also appear to them which possess a kind of worldly wisdom.

The better that patients can assimilate their impressions from the unconscious the easier it is for them to establish a vital and meaningful relationship to their environment, and their condition remains much more stable even if remnants of certain ideas are not worked out.

Degeneration of the personality sets in if such patients are left to themselves.

Even when a patient has fallen into a psychosis he is better protected if he knows something of psychology.

When geometric symbols appear in dreams or drawings they are the original images of the primeval condition.

Geometric designs may also appear if a schizophrenic destruction is threatening.

When everything is threatened with disorder and dissolution the enantiodromic process occurs, corresponding to a time-reversal.

Out of the longing for order the process is reversed as a compensation.

This is the inverse of the process expressed in Boltzmann's principle (increase of disorder) thus, dreams, pictures and fantasies from the unconscious gradually begin to exhibit an order.

Painting and drawing one's inner pictures is a form of self-enchantment for the purpose of inner change which creates what had previously been depicted.

The more libido that goes into the paintings, the more completely do they transform the painter himself.

If someone has a mastery of total critical evaluation, it is possible for him to reach the processes of the unconscious through automatic writing instead of through "active imagination."

He must ask questions, begin a dialectical process,insist on explanations, and protest if he is conscious of holding a different opinion from the one which the hand is writing.

He must treat the voices as if they were patients and interject criticisms.

He must discuss and argue as if it were a matter of life and death, work constructively, observe, watch to see if something really new emerges that is outside his experience.

Such work can have extraordinary effects. The tongue and the hand are, of course, possessed by something other than oneself.

One must not enter into trivial things but remain personal and simple; probate spiritus– watch which spirit is possessing you.
There is still a vast problem here.

It is as if such voices or visions were autonomous.

I still do not have a final opinion on this.

The technique of active imagination can prove very important in difficult situations – where there is a visitation,say.

It only makes sense when one has the feeling of being up against a blank wall.

At such times images can break out of the unconscious.

I experienced this when I separated from Freud. I did not know what I thought. I only felt, "It is not so."

Then I conceived of "symbolic thinking" and after two years of active imagination so many ideas rushed in on me that I could hardly defend myself.

The same thoughts recurred. I appealed to my hands and began to carve wood – and then my way became clear.

Active imagination is only legitimate if one is confronted with an insurmountable obstacle in a situation where no one can give advice.

When I left Freud I did not know where else to begin, but I knew that something else was there and that I must find it.

It drew me to my inner self and my hands fashioned symbolic objects.

Later on ideas began to come and I began to write them down.

I knew that something in Freud's teaching was questionable and that I must find that "other."

I had a strong resistance to such irrational behaviour because it did not fit at all with my picture of the world.

Active imagination and automatic writing, painting and carving pictures from the unconscious, are all indirect methods of finding out what the unconscious means.

Indirect methods are indicated only when the direct way will not allow one to advance.

Schizophrenic cases who have hallucinations have a better prognosis than those who hear voices.

Those who hear voices are more deeply enslaved by the unconscious.

There is no difference in intelligence level between those who tend to have dreams and those who have visions.

The unconscious behaves as if the laws of our world did not exist.

It flies to the roof contemptuous of the laws of gravity.

We must bring its demands down to earth and somehow try to realize them.

We must follow up the fantasies and dreams and search until something is found that can be realized.

Then we have succeeded in approximating the demands of the unconscious to the possibilities of the conscious world.

It is a very real help to find an expression that combines and satisfies the demands of the inner and outer worlds, the unconscious and the conscious.

That is the achievement of the so called transcendent function. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Pages 13-19.

Carl Jung and "The Work" (2019-06-19 05:27)

The Work

As my life entered its second half, I was already embarked on the confrontation with the contents of the unconscious.

My work on this was an extremely long drawn-out affair, and it was only after some twenty years of it that I reached some degree of understanding of my fantasies.

First I had to find evidence for the historical prefiguration of my inner experiences.

That is to say, I had to ask myself, "Where have my particular premises already occurred in history?"

If I had not succeeded in finding such evidence, I would never have been able to substantiate my ideas.

Therefore, my encounter with alchemy was decisive for me, as it provided me with the historical basis which I had hitherto lacked.

Analytical psychology is fundamentally a natural science, but it is subject far more than any other science to the personal bias of the observer.

The psychologist must depend therefore in the highest degree upon historical and literary parallels if he wishes to exclude at least the crudest errors in judgment.

Between 1918 and 1926 1 had seriously studied the Gnostic writers, for they too had been confronted with the primal world of the unconscious and had dealt with its contents, with images that were obviously contaminated with the world of instinct.

Just how they understood these images remains difficult to say, in view of the paucity of the accounts which, moreover, mostly stem from their opponents, the Church Fathers.

It seems to me highly unlikely that they had a psychological conception of them.

But the Gnostics were too remote for me to establish any link with them in regard to the questions that were confronting me.

As far as I could see, the tradition that might have connected Gnosis with the present seemed to have been severed, and for a long time it proved impossible to find any bridge that led from Gnosticism or neo-Platonism to the contemporary world.

But when I began to understand alchemy I realized that it represented the historical link with Gnosticism, and that a continuity therefore existed between past and present.

Grounded in the natural philosophy of the Middle Ages, alchemy formed the bridge on the one hand into the past, to Gnosticism, and on the other into the future, to the modern psychology of the unconscious.

This had been inaugurated by Freud, who had introduced along with it the classical Gnostic motifs of sexuality and the wicked paternal authority.

The motif of the Gnostic Yahweh and Creator-God reappeared in the Freudian myth of the primal father and the gloomy superego deriving from that father.

In Freud’s myth he became a daemon who created a world of disappointments, illusions, and suffering.

But the materialistic trend which had already come to light in the alchemists’ preoccupation with the secrets of matter had the effect of obscuring for Freud that other essential aspect of Gnosticism: the primordial image of the spirit as another, higher god who gave to mankind the krater (mixing vessel), the vessel of spiritual transformation.

I thought the Mother of God and Bride of Christ has been received into the divine thalamus (bridal chamber) only recently, after centuries of hesitancy, and thus at least been accorded partial recognition.

Before I discovered alchemy, I had a series of dreams which repeatedly dealt with the same theme.

Beside my house stood another, that is to say, another wing or annex, which was strange to me.

Each time I would wonder in my dream why I did not know this house, although it had apparently always been there.

Finally came a dream in which I reached the other wing.

I discovered there a wonderful library, dating largely from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

Large, fat folio volumes, bound in pigskin, stood along the walls.

Among them were a number of books embellished with copper engravings of a strange character, and illustrations containing curious symbols such as I had never seen before.

At the time I did not know to what they referred; only much later did I recognize them as alchemical symbols.

In the dream I was conscious only of the fascination exerted by them and by the entire library.

It was a collection of medieval incunabula and sixteenth-century prints.

The unknown wing of the house was a part of my personality, an aspect of myself; it represented something that belonged to me but of which I was not yet conscious.

It, and especially the library, referred to alchemy, of which I was ignorant, but which I was soon to study.

Some fifteen years later I had assembled a library very like the one in the dream.

The crucial dream anticipating my encounter with alchemy came around 1926: I was in the South Tyrol.

It was wartime.

1 was on the Italian front and driving back from the front line with a little man, a peasant, in his horse-drawn wagon.

All around us shells were exploding, and I knew that we had to push on as quickly as possible, for it was very dangerous.

We had to cross a bridge and then go through a tunnel whose vaulting had been partially destroyed by the shells.

Arriving at the end of the tunnel, we saw before us a sunny landscape, and I recognized it as the region around Verona. Below me lay the city, radiant in full sunlight.

I felt relieved, and we drove on out into the green, thriving Lombard plain.

The road led through lovely springtime countryside; we saw the rice fields, the olive trees, and the vineyards.

Then, diagonally across the road, I caught sight of a large building, a manor house of grand proportions, rather like the palace of a North Italian duke.

It was a typical manor house with many annexes and outbuildings.

Just as at the Louvre, the road led through a large courtyard and past the palace.

The little coachman and myself drove in through a gate, and from here we could see, through a second gate at the far end, the sunlit landscape again.

I looked around: to my right was the facade of the manor house, to my left the servants quarters and the stables, barns, and other outbuildings, which stretched on for a long way.

Just as we reached the middle of the courtyard, in front of the main entrance, something unexpected happened: with a dull clang, both gates flew shut.

The peasant leaped down from his seat and exclaimed, "Now we are caught in the seventeenth century."

Resignedly I thought, "Well, that’s that! But what is there to do about it? Now we shall be caught for years."

Then the consoling thought came to me: "Someday, years from now, I shall get out again."

After this dream I plowed through ponderous tomes on the history of the world, of religion, and of philosophy, without finding anything that could help me explain the dream.

Not until much later did I realize that it referred to alchemy, for that science reached its height in the seventeenth century.

Oddly enough, I had entirely forgotten what Herbert Silberer had written about alchemy.

At the time his book was published, I regarded alchemy as something off the beaten track and rather silly, much as I appreciated Silberer's anagogic or constructive point of view.

I was in correspondence with him at the time and had let him know how much I valued his work.

As his tragic death shows, Silberer's discovery of the problem was not followed by insight into it.

He had used in the main late material, which I could make nothing of.

The late alchemical texts are fantastic and baroque; only after we have learned how to interpret them can we recognize what treasures they hide.

Light on the nature of alchemy began to come to me only after I had read the text of the Golden Flower, that specimen of Chinese alchemy which Richard Wilhelm sent me in 1928.

I was stirred by the desire to become more closely acquainted with the alchemical texts.

I commissioned a Munich bookseller to notify me of any alchemical books that might fall into his hands.

Soon afterward I received the first of them, the Artis Auriferae Volumina Duo (1593), a comprehensive collection of Latin treatises among which are a number of the "classics" of alchemy.

I let this book lie almost untouched for nearly two years.

Occasionally I would look at the pictures, and each time I would think, *Good Lord, what nonsense!

This stuff is impossible to understand."

But it persistently intrigued me, and I made up my mind to go into it more thoroughly.

The next winter I began, and soon found it provocative and exciting.

To be sure, the texts still seemed to me blatant nonsense, but here and there would be passages that seemed significant to me, and occasionally I even found a few sentences which I thought I could understand.

Finally I realized that the alchemists were talking in symbols those old acquaintances of mine. "Why, this is fantastic,"

I thought. "1 simply must learn to decipher all this."

By now I was completely fascinated, and buried myself in the texts as often as I had the time.

One night, while I was studying them, I suddenly recalled the dream that I was caught in the seventeenth century.

At last I grasped its meaning. "So that’s it! Now I am condemned to study alchemy from the very beginning.”

It was a long while before I found my way about in the labyrinth of alchemical thought processes, for no Ariadne had put a thread into my hand.

Reading the sixteenth-century text, "Rosarium Philosophorum"

I noticed that certain strange expressions and turns of phrase were frequently repeated.

For example, "solve et coagula" "unum vas" "lapis," "prima materia" "Mercurius" etc.

I saw that these expressions were used again and again in a particular sense, but I could not make out what that sense was.

I therefore decided to start a lexicon of key phrases with cross references.

In the course of time I assembled several thousand such key phrases and words, and had volumes filled with excerpts.

I worked along philological lines, as if I were trying to solve the riddle of an unknown language.

In this way the alchemical mode of expression gradually yielded up its meaning.

It was a task that kept me absorbed for more than a decade.

I had very soon seen that analytical psychology coincided in a most curious way with alchemy.

The experiences of the alchemists were, in a sense, my experiences, and their world was my world.

This was, of course, a momentous discovery: I had stumbled upon the historical counterpart of my psychology of the unconscious.

The possibility of a comparison with alchemy, and the uninterrupted intellectual chain back to Gnosticism, gave substance to my psychology.

When I pored over these old texts everything fell into place: the fantasy-images, the empirical material I had gathered in my practice, and the conclusions I had drawn from it.

I now began to understand what these psychic contents meant when seen in historical perspective.

My understanding of their typical character, which had already begun with my investigation of myths, was deepened.

The primordial images and the nature of the archetype took a central place in my researches, and it became clear to me that without history there can be no psychology, and certainly no psychology of the unconscious.

A psychology of consciousness can, to be sure, content itself with material drawn from personal life, but as soon as we wish to explain a neurosis we require an anamnesis which reaches deeper than the knowledge of consciousness.

And when in the course of treatment unusual decisions are called for, dreams occur that need more than personal memories for their interpretation.

I regard my work on alchemy as a sign of my inner relationship to Goethe.

Goethe’s secret was that he was in the grip of that process of archetypal transformation which has gone on through the centuries.

He regarded his Faust as an opus magnum or divinum.

He called it his "main business/’ and his whole life was enacted within the framework of this drama.

Thus, what was alive and active within him was a living substance, a suprapersonal process, the great dream of the mundus archetypus

I myself am haunted by the same dream, and from my eleventh year I have been launched upon a single enterprise which is my "main business."

My life has been permeated and held together by one idea and one goal: namely, to penetrate into the secret of the personality.

Everything can be explained from this central point, and all my works relate to this one theme.

My real scientific work began with the association experiment in 1903.

1 regard it as my first scientific work in the sense of an undertaking in the field of natural science.

Studies in Word Association was followed by two psychiatric papers whose origin I have already discussed: "The Psychology of Dementia Praecox" and "The Content of the Psychoses.”

In 1912 my book Wandlungen und Symbole der Libido was published, and my friendship with Freud came to an end.

From then on, I had to make my way alone, I had a starting point in my intense preoccupation with the images of my own unconscious.

This period lasted from 1913 to 1917; then the stream of fantasies ebbed away.

Not until it had subsided and I was no longer held captive inside the magic mountain was I able to take an objective view of that whole experience and begin to reflect upon it.

The first question I asked myself was, "What does one do with the unconscious?"

"The Relations between1 the Ego and the Unconscious" was my answer.

In Paris I had delivered a lecture on this subject in 1916; it was, however, not published in German until twelve years later, in greatly expanded form.

In it I described some of the typical contents of the unconscious, and showed that it is by no means a matter of indifference what attitude the conscious mind takes toward them.

Simultaneously, I was busy with preparatory work for Psychological Types, first published in 1921.

This work sprang originally from my need to define the ways in which my outlook differed from Freud's and Adler's.

In attempting to answer this question, I came across the problem of types; for it is one's psychological type which from the outset determines and limits a person's judgment.

My book, therefore, was an effort to deal with the relationship of the individual to the world, to people and things.

It discussed die various aspects of consciousness, the various attitudes the conscious mind might take toward the world, and thus constitutes a psychology of consciousness regarded from what might be called a clinical angle.

I worked a great deal of literature into this book.

The writings of Spitteler occupied a special place, in particular his Prometheus and Epimetheus; but I also discussed Schiller, Nietzsche, and the intellectual history of the classical era and the Middle Ages.

I was presumptuous enough to send a copy of my book to Spitteler.

He did not answer me, but shortly afterward delivered a lecture in which he declared positively that his Prometheus and Epimetheus

"meant" nothing, that he might just as well have sung, "Spring is come, tra-la-la-la-la."

The book on types yielded the insight that every judgment made by an individual is conditioned by his personality type and that every point of view is necessarily relative.

This raised the question of the unity which must compensate this diversity, and it led me directly to the Chinese concept of Tao.

I have already spoken of the interplay between my inner development and Richard Wilhelm's sending me a Taoist text. In 1929 he and I collaborated on The Secret of the Golden Flower.

It was only after I had reached the central point in my thinking and in my researches, namely, the concept of the self, that I once more found my way back to the world.

I began delivering lectures and taking a number of journeys.

The various essays and lectures formed a kind of counterpoise to the years of interior searching.

They also contained answers to the questions that were put to me by my readers and patients.

A subject with which I had been deeply concerned ever since my book Wandlungen und Symbole was the theory of the libido.

I conceived the libido as a psychic analogue of physical energy, hence as a more or less quantitative concept, which therefore should not be defined in qualitative terms.

My idea was to escape from the then prevailing concretism of the libido theory in other words, I wished no longer to speak of the instincts of hunger, aggression, and sex, but to regard all these phenomena as expressions of psychic energy.

In physics, too, we speak of energy and its various manifestations, such as electricity, light, heat, etc.

The situation in psychology is precisely the same.

Here, too, we are dealing primarily with energy, that is to say, with measures of intensity, with greater or lesser quantities.

It can appear in various guises.

If we conceive of libido as energy, we can take a comprehensive and unified view.

Qualitative questions as to the nature of the libido whether it be sexuality, power, hunger, or something else recede into the background.

What I wished to do for psychology was to arrive at some logical and thorough view such as is provided in the physical sciences by the theory of energetics.

This is what I was after in my paper "On Psychic Energy" (1928). I see man’s drives, for example, as various manifestations of energic processes and thus as forces analogous to heat, light, etc.

Just as it would not occur to the modern physicist to derive all forces from, shall We say, heat alone, so the psychologist should beware of lumping all instincts under the concept of sexuality.

This was Freud’s initial error which he later corrected by his assumption of "ego-instincts."

Still later he brought in the superego, and conferred virtual supremacy upon it.

In "The Relations between the Ego and the Unconscious" I had discussed only my preoccupation with the unconscious, and something of the nature of that preoccupation, but had not yet said anything much about the unconscious itself.

As I worked with my fantasies, I became aware that the unconscious undergoes or produces change.

I was presumptuous enough to send a copy of my book to Spitteler.

In individual cases that transformation can be read from dreams and fantasies.

In collective life it has left its deposit principally in the various religious systems and their changing symbols.

Through the study of these collective transformation processes and through understanding of alchemical symbolism I arrived at the central concept of my psychology: the process of individuation.

An essential aspect of my work is that it soon began to touch on the question of one’s view of the world, and on the relations between psychology and religion.

I went into these matters in detail first in "Psychology and Religion" (1938) and then, as a direct offshoot of this, in Paracelsica (1942).

The second essay in this book, "Paracelsus as a Spiritual Phenomenon," is of particular importance from this point of view.

The writings of Paracelsus contain a wealth of original ideas, including clear formulations of the questions posed by the alchemists, though these are set forth in late and baroque dress.

Through Paracelsus I was finally led to discuss the nature of alchemy in relation to religion and psychology or, to put it another way, of alchemy as a form of religious philosophy.

This I did in Psychology and Alchemy (1944).

Thus I had at last reached the ground which underlay my own experiences of the years 1913 to 1917; for the process through which I had passed at that time corresponded to the process of alchemical transformation discussed in that book.

It is only natural that I should constantly have revolved in my mind the question of the relationship of the symbolism of the unconscious to Christianity as well as to other religions.

Not only do I leave the door open for the Christian message, but I consider it of central importance for Western man.

It needs, however, to be seen in a new light, in accordance with the changes wrought by the contemporary spirit.

Otherwise, it stands apart from the times, and has no effect on man's wholeness.

I have endeavored to show this in my writings.

I have given a psychological interpretation of the dogma of the Trinity and of the text of the Mass which, moreover, I compared with the visions described by Zosimos of Panopolis, a third-century alchemist and Gnostic.

My attempt to bring analytical psychology into relation with Christianity ultimately led to the question of Christ as a psychological figure.

As early as 1944, in Psychology and Alchemy, I had been able to demonstrate the parallelism between the Christ figure and the central concept of the alchemists, the lapis, or stone.

In 1939 1 gave a seminar on the Spiritual Exercises of Ignatius Loyola.

At the same time I was occupied on the studies for Psychology and Alchemy.

One night I awoke and saw, bathed in bright light at the foot of my bed, the figure of Christ on the Cross.

It was not quite life-size, but extremely distinct; and I saw that his body was made of greenish gold.

The vision was marvelously beautiful, and yet I was profoundly shaken by it.

A vision as such is nothing unusual for me, for I frequently see extremely vivid hypnagogic images.

I had been thinking a great deal about the Anima Christi, one of the meditations from the Spiritual Exercises.

The vision came to me as if to point out that I had overlooked something in iny reflections: the analogy of Christ with the aurum non vulgi and the viriditas of the alchemists.

When I realized that the vision pointed to this central alchemical symbol, and that I had had an essentially alchemical vision of Christ, I felt comforted.

The green gold is the living quality which the alchemists saw not only in man but also in inorganic nature.

It is an expression of the life-spirit, the anima mundi or films macrocosmi, the Anthropos who animates the whole cosmos.

This spirit has poured himself out into everything, even into inorganic matter; he is present in metal and stone.

My vision was thus a union of the Christ-image with his analogue in matter, the filius macrocosmi.

If I had not been so struck by the greenish-gold, I would have been tempted to assume that something essential was missing from my "Christian" view in other words, that my traditional Christ-image was somehow inadequate and that I still had to catch up with part of the Christian development.

The emphasis on the metal, however, showed me the undisguised alchemical conception of Christ as a union of spiritually alive and physically dead matter.

I took up the problem of Christ again in Aion.

Here I was concerned not with the various historical parallels but with the relation of the Christ figure to psychology.

Nor did I see Christ as a figure stripped of all externalities.

Rather, I wished to show the development, extending over the centuries, of the religious content which he represented.

It was also important to me to show how Christ could have been astrologically predicted, and how he was understood both in terms of the spirit of his age and in the course of two thousand years of Christian civilization.

This was what I wanted to portray, together with all the curious marginal glosses which have accumulated around him in the course of the centuries.

As I delved into all these matters the question of the historical person, of Jesus the man, also came up.

It is of importance because the collective mentality of his time one might also say: the archetype which was already constellated, the primordial image of the Anthropos was condensed in him, an almost unknown Jewish prophet.

The ancient idea of the Anthropos, whose roots lie in Jewish tradition on the one hand and in the Egyptian Horus myth on the other, had taken possession of the people at the beginning of the Christian era, for it was part of the Zeitgeist.

It was essentially concerned with the Son of Man, God’s own son, who stood opposed to the deified Augustus, the ruler of this world.

This idea fastened upon the originally Jewish problem of the Messiah and made it a world problem.

It would be a serious misunderstanding to regard as "mere chance” the fact that Jesus, the carpenter’s son, proclaimed the gospel and became the savior of the world.

He must have been a person of singular gifts to have been able so completely to express and to represent the general, though unconscious, expectations of his age.

No one else could have been the bearer of such a message; it was possible only for this particular man Jesus.

In those times the omnipresent, crushing power of Rome, embodied in the divine Caesar, had created a world where countless individuals, indeed whole peoples, were robbed of their cultural independence and of their spiritual autonomy.

Today, individuals and cultures are faced with a similar threat, namely of being swallowed up in the mass.

Hence in many places there is a wave of hope in a reappearance of Christ, and a visionary rumor has even arisen which expresses expectations of redemption.

The form it has taken, however, is comparable to nothing in the past, but is a typical child of the "age of technology."

This is the worldwide distribution of the UFO phenomenon (unidentified flying objects).

Since my aim was to demonstrate the full extent to which my psychology corresponded to alchemy or vice versa I wanted to discover, side by side with the religious questions, what special problems of psychotherapy were treated in the work of the alchemists.

The main problem of medical psychotherapy is the transference.

In this matter Freud and I were in complete agreement.

I was able to demonstrate that alchemy, too, had something that corresponded to the transference is namely, the concept of the coniunctio, whose pre-eminent importance had been noted already by Silberer.

Evidence for this correspondence is contained in my book, Psychology and Alchemy.

Two years later, in 1946, 1 pursued the matter further in "Psychology of the Transference," and finally my researches led to the Mysterium Coniunctionis.

As with all problems that concerned me personally or scientifically, that of the coniunctio was accompanied or heralded by dreams.

In one of these dreams both this and the Christ problem were condensed in a remarkable image.

I dreamed once more that my house had a large wing which I had never visited. I resolved to look at it, and finally entered.

I came to a big double door.

When I opened it, I found myself in a room set up as a laboratory.

In front of the window stood a table covered with many glass vessels and all the paraphernalia of a zoological laboratory.

This was my father's workroom.

However, he was not there.

On shelves along the walls stood hundreds of bottles containing every imaginable sort of fish.

I was astonished: so now my father was going in for ichthyology.

As I stood there and looked around I noticed a curtain which bellied out from time to time, as though a strong wind were blowing. Suddenly Hans, a young man from the country, appeared.

I told him to look and see whether a window were open in the room behind the curtain.

He went, and was gone for some time.

When he returned, I saw an expression of terror on his face. He said only, "Yes, there is something. It’s haunted in there!

Then I myself went, and found a door which led to my mother’s room.

There was no one in it.

The atmosphere was uncanny.

The room was very large, and suspended from the ceiling were two rows of five chests each, hanging about two feet above the floor.

They looked like small garden pavilions, each about six feet in area, and each containing two beds.

I knew that this was the room where my mother, who in reality had long been dead, was visited, and that she had set up these beds for visiting spirits to sleep.

They were spirits who came in pairs, ghostly married couples, so to speak, who spent the night or even the day there.

Opposite my mother’s room was a door.

I opened it and entered a vast hall; it reminded me of the lobby of a large hotel.

It was fitted out with easy chairs, small tables, pillars, sumptuous hangings, etc.

A brass band was playing loudly; I had heard music all along in the background, but without knowing where it came from.

There was no one in the hall except the brass band blaring forth dance tunes and inarches.

The brass band in the hotel lobby suggested ostentatious jollity and worldliness.

No one would have guessed that behind this loud facade was the other world, also located in the same building.

The dream-image of the lobby was, as it were, a caricature of my bonhomie or worldly joviality.

But this was only the outside aspect; behind it lay something quite different, which could not be investigated in the blare of the band music: the fish laboratory and the hanging pavilions for spirits.

Both were awesome places in which a mysterious silence prevailed.

In them I had the feeling: Here is the dwelling of night; whereas the lobby stood for the daylight world and its superficiality.

The most important images in the dream were the "reception room for spirits" and the fish laboratory.

The former expresses in somewhat farcial fashion the coniunctio; the latter indicates my preoccupation with Christ, who himself is the fish (ichthys) .

Both were subjects that were to keep me on the go for more than a decade.

It is remarkable that the study of fish was attributed to my father. In the dream he was a caretaker of Christian souls, for, according to the ancient view, these are fish caught in Peter’s net.

It is equally remarkable that in the same dream my mother was a guardian of departed spirits.

Thus both my parents appeared burdened with the problem of the "cure of souls," which in fact was really my task.

Something had remained unfinished and was still with my parents; that is to say, it was still latent in the unconscious and hence reserved for the future.

I was being reminded that I had not yet dealt with the major concern of "philosophical" alchemy, the coniunctio, and thus had not answered the question which the Christian soul put to me.

Also the major work on the Grail legend, which my wife had made her life's task, was not completed.

1 recall how often the quest for the Grail and the fisher king came to my mind while I was working on the ichthys symbol in Aion.

Had it not been for my unwillingness to intrude upon my wife's field, I would unquestionably have had to include the Grail legend in my studies of alchemy.

My memory of my father is of a sufferer stricken with an Amfortas wound, a "fisher king" whose wound would not heal that Christian suffering for which the alchemists sought the panacea.

I as a "dumb" Parsifal was the witness of this sickness during the years of my boyhood, and, like Parsifal, speech failed me.

I had only inklings. In actuality my father had never interested himself in theriomorphic Christ-symbolism.

On the other hand he had literally lived right up to his death the suffering prefigured and promised by Christ, without ever becoming aware that this was a consequence of the imitatio Christi.

He regarded his suffering as a personal affliction for which you might ask a doctor’s advice; he did not see it as the suffering of the Christian in general.

The words of Galatians 2:20: "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me," never penetrated his mind in their full significance, for any thinking about religious matters sent shudders of horror through him.

He wanted to rest content with faith, but faith broke faith with him.

Such is frequently the reward of the samficium intellectus.

"Not all men can receive this precept, but only those to whom it is given. . . . There are eunuchs who have made themselves eunuchs for the sake of the kingdom of heaven. He who is able to receive this, let him receive it." (Matthew ignif.)

Blind acceptance never leads to a solution; at best it leads only to a standstill and is paid for heavily in the next generation.

The theriomorphic attributes of the gods show that the gods extend not only into superhuman regions but also into the subhuman realm.

The animals are their shadows, as it were, which nature herself associates with the divine image.

The "pisciculi Christianorum" show that those who imitate Christ are themselves fish that is, unconscious souls who require the cura animarum.

The fish laboratory is a synonym for the ecclesiastical "cure of souls.”

And just as the wounder wounds himself, so the healer heals himself.

Significantly, in the dream the decisive activity is carried out by the dead upon the dead, in the world beyond consciousness, that is, in the unconscious.

At that stage of my life, therefore, I was still not conscious of an essential aspect of my task, nor would I have been able to give a satisfactory interpretation of the dream.

I could only sense its meaning.

I still had to overcome the greatest inner resistances before I could write Answer to Job.

The inner root of this book is to be found in Aion.

There I had dealt with the psychology of Christianity, and Job is a kind of prefiguration of Christ.

The link between them is the idea of suffering.

Christ is the suffering servant of God, and so was Job.

In the case of Christ the sins of the world are the cause of suffering, and the suffering of the Christian is the general answer.

This leads inescapably to the question: Who is responsible for these sins?

In the final analysis it is God who created the world and its sins, and who therefore became Christ in order to suffer the fate of humanity.

In Aion there are references to the bright and dark side of the divine image.

I cited the "wrath of God" the commandment to fear God, and the petition "Lead us not into temptation/' The ambivalent God-image plays a crucial part in the Book of Job.

Job expects that God will, in a sense, stand by him against God; in this we have a picture of God's tragic contradictoriness.

This was the main theme of Answer to Job, There were outside forces, too, which impelled me to write this book.

The many questions from the public and from patients had made me feel that I must express myself more clearly about the religious problems of modern man.

For years I had hesitated to do so, because I was fully aware of the storm I would be unleashing.

But at last I could not help being gripped by the problem, in all its urgency and difficulty, and I found myself compelled to give an answer.

I did so in the form in which the problem had presented itself to me, that is, as an experience charged with emotion.

I chose this form deliberately, in order to avoid giving the impression that I was bent on proclaiming some eternal truth.

My Answer to Job was meant to be no more than the utterance of a single individual, who hopes and expects to arouse some thoughtfulness in his public.

I was far from wanting to enunciate a metaphysical truth.

Yet the theologians tax me with that very thing, because theological thinkers are so used to dealing with eternal truths that they know no other kinds.

When the physicist says that the atom is of such and such a composition, and when he sketches a model of it, he too does not intend to express anything like an eternal truth.

But theologians do not understand the natural sciences and, particularly, psychological thinking.

The material of analytical psychology, its principal facts, consist of statements of statements that occur frequently in consistent form at various places and at various times.

The problem of Job in all its ramifications had likewise been foreshadowed in a dream.

It started with my paying a visit to my long-deceased father.

He was living in the country I did not know where. I saw a house in the style of the eighteenth century, very roomy, with several rather large outbuildings.

It had originally been, I learned, an inn at a/spa, and it seemed that many great personages, famous people and princes, had stopped there.

Furthermore, several had died and their sarcophagi were in a crypt belonging to the house.

My father guarded these as custodian.

He was, as I soon discovered, not only the custodian but also a distinguished scholar in his own right which he had never been in his lifetime.

I met him in his study, and, oddly enough, Dr. Y. who was about my age and his son, both psychiatrists, were also present.

I do not know whether I had asked a question or whether my father wanted to explain something of his own accord, but in any case he fetched a big Bible down from a shelf, a heavy folio volume like the Merian Bible in my library.

The Bible my father held was bound in shiny fishskin.

He opened it at the Old Testament I guessed that he turned to the Pentateuch and began interpreting a certain passage.

He did this so swiftly and so learnedly that I could not follow him.

I noted only that what he said betrayed a vast amount of variegated knowledge, the significance of which I dimly apprehended but could not properly judge or grasp.

I saw that Dr. Y. understood nothing at all, and his son began to laugh.

They thought that my father was going off the deep end and what he said was simply senile prattle.

But it was quite clear to me that it was not due to morbid excitement, and that there was nothing silly about what he was saying.

On the contrary, his argument was so intelligent and so learned that we in our stupidity simply could not follow it.

It dealt with something extremely important which fascinated him.

That was why he was speaking with such intensity; his mind was flooded with profound ideas.

I was annoyed and thought it was a pity that he had to talk in the presence of three such idiots as we.

The two psychiatrists represented a limited medical point of view which, of course, also infects me as a physician.

They represent my shadow first and second editions of the shadow, father and son.

Then the scene changed.

My father and I were in front of the house, facing a kind of shed where, apparently, wood was stacked.

We heard loud thumps, as if large chunks of wood were being thrown down or tossed about.

I had the impression that at least two workmen must be busy there, but my father indicated to me that the place was haunted.

Some sort of poltergeists were making the racket, evidently.

We then entered the house, and I saw that it had very thick walls.

We climbed a narrow staircase to the second floor.

There a strange sight presented itself: a large hall which was the exact replica of the divan-i-kaas (council hall) of Sultan Akbar at Fatehpur Sikri.

It was a high, circular room with a gallery running along the wall, from which four bridges led to a basin shaped center.

The basin rested upon a huge column and formed the sultan’s round seat.

From this elevated place he spoke to his councilors and philosophers, who sat along the walls in the gallery.

The whole was a gigantic mandala.

It corresponded precisely to the real divan-i-kaas.

In the dream I suddenly saw that from the center a steep flight of stairs ascended to a spot high up on the wall which no longer corresponded to reality.

At the top of the stairs was a small door, and my father said, "Now I will lead you into the highest presence."

Then he knelt down and touched his forehead to the floor.

I imitated him, likewise kneeling, with great emotion.

For some reason I could not bring my forehead quite down to the floor there was perhaps a millimeter to spare.

But at least I had made the gesture with him.

Suddenly I knew perhaps my father had told me that that upper door led to a solitary chamber where lived Uriah, King David’s general, whom David had shamefully betrayed for the sake of his wife Bathsheba, by commanding his soldiers to abandon Uriah in the face of the enemy.

I must make a few explanatory remarks concerning this dream.

The initial scene describes how the unconscious task which I had left to my "father," that is, to the unconscious, was working out.

He was obviously engrossed in the Bible Genesis? And eager to communicate his insights.

The fishskin marks the Bible as an unconscious content, for fishes are mute and unconscious.

My poor father does not succeed in communicating either, for the audience is in part incapable of understanding, in part maliciously stupid.

After this defeat we cross the street to the "other side," where poltergeists are at work.

Poltergeist phenomena usually take place in the vicinity of young people before puberty; that is to say, I am still immature and too unconscious.

The Indian ambience illustrates the "other side."

When I was in India, the mandala structure of the divan i-kaas had in actual fact powerfully impressed me as the representation of a content related to a center.

The center is the seat of Akbar the Great, who rules over a subcontinent, who is a "lord of this world," like David.

But even higher than David stands his guiltless victim, his loyal general Uriah, whom he abandoned to the enemy.

Uriah is a prefiguration of Christ, the god-man who was abandoned by God. "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

On top of that, David had "taken unto himself" Uriah's wife.

Only later did I understand what this allusion to Uriah signified: not only was I forced to speak publicly, and very much to my detriment, about the ambivalence of the God-image in the Old Testament; but also, my wife would be taken from me by death.

These were the things that awaited me, hidden in the unconscious.

I had to submit to this fate, and ought really to have touched my forehead to the floor, so that my submission would be complete.

But something prevented me from doing so entirely, and kept me just a millimeter away.

Something in me was saying, "All very well, but not entirely."

Something in me was defiant and determined not to be a dumb fish: and if there were not something of the sort in free men, no Book of Job would have been written several hundred years before the birth of Christ.

Man always has some mental reservation, even in the face of divine decrees.

Otherwise, where would be his freedom?

And what would be the use of that freedom if it could not threaten Him who threatens it?

Uriah, then, lives in a higher place than Akbar.

He is even, as the dream said, the '^highest presence,'* an expression which properly is used only of God, unless we are dealing in Byzantinisms.

I cannot help thinking here of the Buddha and his relationship to the gods.

For the devout Asiatic, the Tathagata is the All-Highest, the Absolute.

For that reason Hinayana Buddhism has been suspected of atheism very wrongly so.

By virtue of the power of the gods man is enabled to gain an insight into his Creator.

He has even been given the power to annihilate Creation in its essential aspect, that is, man’s consciousness of the world.

Today he can extinguish all higher life on earth by radioactivity.

The idea of world annihilation is already suggested by the Buddha: by means of enlightenment the Nidana chain the chain of causality which leads inevitably to old age, sickness, and death can be broken, so that the illusion of Being comfes to an end. Schopenhauer’s negation of the

Will points prophetically to a problem of the future that has already come threating close.

The dream discloses a thought and a premonition that have long been present in humanity: the idea of the creature that surpasses its creator by a small but decisive factor.

After this excursion into the world of dreams, I must once more come back to my writings.

In Aion I embarked upon a cycle of problems that needed to be dealt with separately.

I had attempted to explain how the appearance of Christ coincided with the beginning of a new aeon, the age of the Fishes.

A synchronicity exists between the life of Christ and the objective astronomical event, the entrance of the spring equinox into the sign of Pisces. Christ is therefore the "Fish" (just as Hammurabi before him was the "Ram"), and comes forth as the ruler of the new aeon.

This led to the problem of synchronicity, which I discussed in my paper "Synchronicity: An Acausal Connecting Principle."

The Christ problem in Aion finally led me to the question of how the phenomenon of the Anthropos in psychological terms, the self is expressed in the experience of the individual.

I attempted to give an answer to this in Von den Wurzeln des Bewusstseins (1954).

There I was concerned with the interplay between conscious and unconscious, with the development of consciousness from the unconscious, and with the impact of the greater personality, the inner man, upon the life of every individual.

This investigation was rounded out by the Mysterium Coniunctionis, in which I once again took up the problem of the transference, but primarily followed my original intention of representing the whole range of alchemy as a kind of psychology of alchemy, or as an alchemical basis for depth psychology.

In Mysterium Coniunctionis my psychology was at last given its place in reality and established upon its historical foundations.

Thus my task was finished, my work done, and now it can stand.

The moment I touched bottom, I reached the bounds of scientific understanding, the transcendental, the nature of the archetype per se, concerning which no further scientific statements can be made.

The survey I have given here of my work is, of course, only a brief summary.

I really ought to say a great deal more, or a great deal less.

It is an improvisation, like everything I am relating here. It is born of the moment.

Those who know my work may possibly profit by it; others perhaps will be impelled to look into my ideas.

My life is what I have done, my scientific work; the one is inseparable from the other.

The work is the expression of my inner development; for commitment to the contents of the unconscious forms the man and produces his transformations.

My works can be regarded as stations along my life's way.

All my writings may be considered tasks imposed from within; their source was a fateful compulsion.

What I wrote were things that assailed me from within myself.

I permitted the spirit that moved me to speak out.

I have never counted upon any strong response, any powerful resonance, to my writings.

They represent a compensation for our times, and I have been impelled to say what no one wants to hear.

For that reason, and especially at the beginning, I often felt utterly forlorn.

I knew that what I said would be unwelcome, for it is difficult for people of our times to accept the counterweight to the conscious world.

Today I can say that it is truly astonishing that I have had as much success as has been accorded me far more than I ever could have expected.

I have the feeling that I have done all that it was possible for me to do.

Without a doubt that life work could have been larger, and could have been done better; but more was not within my power. Carl Jung, Memories, Dreams and Reflections, Pages 200-237

Carl Jung on be grounded in the rational. (2019-06-20 02:40)

It is under all conditions a most advisable thing to keep to the conscious and rational side, i.e., to maintain that side.

One never should lose sight of it. It is the safeguard without which you would lose yourself on unknown seas.

You would invite illness, indeed, if you should give up your conscious and rational orientation.

On the other hand, it is equally true that life is not only rational.

To a certain extent you have to keep your senses open to the non-rational aspects of existence. . . .

The unconscious itself is neither tricky nor evil - it is Nature, both beautiful and terrible. . . .

The best way of dealing with the unconscious is the creative way. . . Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 108-109.

Jung has said that the unconscious long identified as the oceanic in man, is Nature.

The seeker of himself often feels cast adrift, setting a course between light and dark but ultimately moved along by unseen currents deep within. Claire Dunne, Wounded Healer of the Soul, Page 87.

Carl Jung on how the Unconscious expresses itself through Depression. (2019-06-20 02:44)

The unconscious can also express itself through a depression.

People so spoilt by success that they are no longer accustomed to struggle for it, must sometimes suffer disaster in order to wake up: otherwise life is too easy for them.

They are too comfortable and they have to pay for it somehow.

Many are plagued by chronic ailments or intermittent depressions because fate does not torment them in other ways.

Chronic illness or depression is then directly meaningful. They are mechanisms, to be sure, but so long as people are enslaved by these mechanisms they are saved from a more cruel fate.

There are some patients the analyst must even treat emotionally, and he must not allow certain other patients to exploit him. He can talk very openly and sternly to these and even respond emotionally to them. Such people enslave others.

They must be shown that they have a desire to dominate: they must be told the truth.

People of this kind are subject to depression because they want to rule others but cannot manage to. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 15.

Carl Jung on the "Archetype of the Shadow." (2019-06-20 03:16)

The Archetype of the Shadow

The Bible says, "Whosoever shall say "Racha" to his brother is guilty of hellfire. "If we substitute "shadow" for "brother" and implicate the dark brother within, we open out this biblical word into new perspectives.

It also says, "Reconcile yourself with him as long as he is on the road." "What ye have done to the least of your brethren ye have done unto me."

The least of me is my inferior function which represents my shadow- side. But what, if the inferior and neglected function expresses the will of God?

When sacrifice is demanded it frequently implies the acceptance of our shadow- side.

If the poles of the psyche are torn apart and there is no living centre in a person, he feels forsaken and dominated by demons.

His self is empty and he cannot draw the opposites together.

The best protection against abandonment to demons is a conscious relationship to a close, living human being.

In the case of a woman the relationship should be to a man.

We should not try to escape upward or downward from the world.

To want to be the best or the worst of men is megalomania. It is devilish arrogance to want to destroy ourselves whenever we feel profoundly miserable.

That state of consciousness which will not let us admit to having a shadow pushes his surroundings into a position of inferiority.

All "good people" suffer from irritability.

We must be charitable to our weaknesses. An alchemical text says: "The mind should learn compassionate love for the body."

The unconscious shows us the face that we turn towards it.

It smiles if we are friendly to it; but if we neglect it, it makes faces at us.

We can only become real by accepting our sexuality and not denying it through saintliness. We must descend into our own depths to have the visio Dei.

There are always people who want to bring light into the world because they are afraid to reach down into their own dirt. But who can be humble who has not sinned?

This is why sin is so important; this is why it is said that God loves the sinner more than ninety-nine righteous men.

The meaning of sin is that it teaches humility; the Church says, felix culpa. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Archetypes of the Shadow, Pages 25.

Carl Jung: But reason accomplishes nothing, because the puer aeternus is always an agent of destiny. (2019-06-20 03:30)

To Oskar A. H. Schmitz

Dear Herr Schmitz, 23 February 1931

I consider the puer aeternus1 attitude an unavoidable evil.

Identity with the puer signifies a psychological puerility that could do nothing better than outgrow itself.

It always leads to external blows of fate which show the need for another attitude.

But reason accomplishes nothing, because the puer aeternus is always an agent of destiny.

With best regards,

Letter to Kaegi
7 Nov 1932
It is strange that the broad, shining surface of things always interests me much less than those dark, labyrinthine, subterranean passages they come out of.
Civilizations seem to me like those plants whose real & continuous life is found in the rhizome & not in the quickly fading flowers and withering leaves which appear on the surface & which we regard as the essential manifestation of life.
I almost believe that the real history of the human mind is a rhizome phenomenon.

Dear Herr Kaegi, 7 November 1932

Thank you very much for kindly sending me your offprint.

I am glad you have drawn my attention to Walser.

As you are obviously well acquainted with Walser's writings, I would like to ask you whether Walser has also taken an interest in the Ipnerotomachia of Francesco Colonna.

I find that it gives us a key to the backdoors of the Renaissance.

It is strange that the broad, shining surface of things always interests me much less than those dark, labyrinthine, subterranean passages they come out of.

Civilizations seem to me like those plants whose real and continuous life is found in the rhizome and not in the quickly fading flowers and withering leaves which appear on the surface and which we regard as the essential manifestation of life.

Burckhardt mentions Colonna's work but for understandable reasons he sees nothing in it.

Of the more recent writers, it seems to be chiefly Luigi Valli who has ventured into the background.

I almost believe that the real history of the human mind is a rhizome phenomenon.

With best thanks,

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Harrison,
the problem of the Ufos is ,as you rightly say, a very fascinating-one, but it is as puzzling as it is fascinating; since, in spite of all observations I know of, there is no certainty about their very nature. On the other side there is an overwhelming material pointing to their legendary or mythological aspect. As a matter of fact the psychological aspect is so impressive, that one almost must regret that the Ufos seem to be real after all. I have followed up the literature as much as possible and it looks to me as if something were seen and even confirmed by Radar, but nobody knows exactly what is seen. ~~and~~ In consideration of the psychological aspect of the phenomenon I have written a booklet about it, which is soon to appear. It is also in the process of being translated into English. Unfortunately being occupied with other tasks I am unable to meet your proposition. Being rather old, I have to economise my energies.

Very sincerely yours

C. G. Jung.

In 1957, with Flying Saucers to appear the following year, New Republic editor Gilbert A. Harrison wanted to get this Jungian perspective on UFOs in his magazine.

Carl Jung and Ghosts (2019-06-20 03:39)

Explorations: Jung in England: Ghost and Personality Types By Vivianne Crowley

In 1920, Carl Jung, the father of Analytic Psychology, was invited to Britain to give seminars. In his leisure time he visited Tintagel Castle, the supposed birthplace of King Arthur, and mystical Glastonbury, where St. Joseph of Arimathea is reputed to have brought the Holy Grail for safekeeping. Jung's intuitive mind had been open to the paranormal from a very early age. In Britain, he was in a land steeped in history—and in ghosts.

Jung disliked hotels, so he asked a friend to help him rent a cheap country cottage where he could stay on weekends. However, when he was at the cottage, he got little rest. On the first weekend, he woke to find a sickly smell pervading the bedroom. The next weekend, the smell was accompanied by a rustling noise of something brushing along the walls. It seemed to Jung that a large animal must be in the room. On the third weekend, there were knocking sounds. By now, most people would have given up and decided to spend their weekends elsewhere, but not Jung. On the fifth weekend, he woke up to find a hideous apparition beside him on the pillow. It was an old woman, part of whose face was missing.

Jung questioned the cleaners, who confirmed that the cottage was indeed haunted. This explained the suspiciously low rent and the cleaners' reluctance to be there after dark. Not all of Jung's colleagues were inclined to believe in ghosts. The colleague who had rented the cottage on Jung's behalf was unimpressed with what Jung told him, so Jung challenged him to spend the night there. He tried, but was so terrified he did not even remain in the bedroom. He took his bed into the garden and slept outside with his shotgun beside him. Shortly afterward, the cottage's owner had it demolished—it was impossible for anyone to live there.

Personality Types

One of Jung's aims during his British seminars in 1920 was to refine his ideas about personality. In 1921, he published what is now the sixth volume of his Collected Works, entitled Psychological Types. In addition to two attitudes to the world, extroversion and introversion, Jung identified four personality types or functions: "sensation," "intuition," "thinking," and "feeling." Of these psychological types or functions, Jung wrote (Psychological Types 518):

> For complete orientation all four functions should contribute equally: thinking should facilitate cognition and judgment, feeling should tell us how and to what extent a thing is important for us, sensation should convey concrete reality to us through seeing, hearing, tasting, etc., and intuition should enable us to divine the hidden possibilities in the background, since these too belong to the complete picture of a given situation.

The idea that there are four basic personality types is found in many cultures and is at the heart of astrology. The ancient Greeks believed that the whole of creation was made up of four elements—Earth, Air, Fire, and Water. Personality was seen as influenced by these four elements—people were a mixture of the elements, but in each of us one element predominates, affecting our personality and body type. The personality types relate to the four elements: sensation to Earth, thinking to Air, intuition to Fire, and feeling to Water. The idea that intuition is fiery may seem strange, but if you consider Jung's idea of intuition as akin to creative inspiration, then it begins to make sense.

The personality types also relate to the astrological signs through the four elements. In astrology, the Air signs are Aquarius, Gemini, and Libra; the Fire signs are Aries, Leo, and Sagittarius; the Water signs are Pisces, Cancer, and Scorpio; and the Earth signs are Taurus, Virgo, and Capricorn. If a patient was particularly difficult to understand, Jung would send him or her to an expert astrologer to have a natal chart prepared, which Jung would then interpret psychologically. There is no simple relationship between sun sign and dominant personality type, but a skilled astrologer can predict the dominant personality type from the overall dynamics of the chart.

Four Functions

In order to function in the world, we need to receive information and then make judgments about how to act on it. Sensation and intuition are different ways of perceiving and receiving information. Thinking and feeling are judging functions. They are two different measuring instruments that help us to process the information we receive.

We cannot use two perceptual functions or two judging functions at the same time. The different modes of perceiving—sensation and intuition—are like looking at the world through different pairs of glasses with different lenses. We can only use one pair at a time. We call on the other when we need to, but it is less familiar to us and therefore we use it less skillfully. Similarly, we cannot use two judgment functions as measuring instruments at the same time. We use either thinking or feeling first to evaluate the data we receive, and then call on the other for extra information.

Jung's ideas on personality types are clearly illustrated by four characters in the original Star Trek series: Mr. Spock, the thinker; Dr. McCoy or Bones, the feeler; Scotty, the sensate engineer; and Captain Kirk, the intuitive leader. Captain Kirk's impulsiveness was always getting them into trouble, but his leaps of lateral imagination got them out again. When the team worked well together, they solved most of their problems.

Thinking and Feeling

Thinking tells us whether something is logical and rational, correct or incorrect. Thinking types enjoy analyzing information and making logical decisions. They tend to be good at science, mathematics, or business. Introverted thinking people like computers and classification systems. They can be good at playing the stock market and gambling. Extroverted thinkers love to organize others. They are born administrators.

Feeling tells us whether something is pleasant or unpleasant, good or bad, helpful or harmful. We need our feeling function when dealing with people and making relationships. Feeling people make good social workers who will move heaven and earth to help a deserving client. Feeling people build relationships of trust and are excellent parents, teachers, and ministers.

Sensation and Intuition

Sensation operates through the physical senses, and we use it to discover facts. Sensation types are usually practical people who spot physical clues that others miss. As doctors, they make good diagnosticians. As mechanics, they will often recognize the annoying engine noise that electronic faultfinding devices failed to identify. As fashion experts, they match color with an unerring eye. Sensation is reality-oriented, focused in the here and now. Sensate people remember names and dates and make great collectors, whether of stamps or antiques.

Intuition shows us meanings and implications. It tells us how situations are likely to develop in the future. Intuitives have hunches and "know" things, but do not know how they know. Intuition is the function of the imagination. People with extroverted intuition have an idea where society is going and will be at the leading edge of new technologies, businesses, fashions, and creeds. They love new ideas and new projects. Introverted intuition is the function of the creative writer and of the daydreamer. Intuitives can be content to dream their lives away without ever bringing their brilliant imaginings to fruition—they start more than they finish.

Dominant and Secondary Functions

Our dominant and secondary functions are the perceptual and judgmental functions that we use most in everyday life. These functions impact on our outer personality, affecting how people see us and react to us.

Relating to a person whose first and second functions are opposite to ours can create problems. Sensate thinkers are interested in practical matters, business, and politics. They will be easily bored by discussions about people's feelings. Intuitive feelers are romantic. They like being told that their partner loves them. "Of course I love you," the sensate thinker replies, "I bought you that new CD player, didn't I?" Intuitive thinkers talk about abstract ideas and find sensate feelers materialistic. A sensate feeling parent may feel hurt by an intuitive thinking child's apparent coldness. When she or he is in the middle of doing something complex on the computer, an intuitive thinker may find it irritating to feel obliged to respond to a sensate feeling person's need for hugs. This does not make these relationships impossible, but it does make them more challenging.

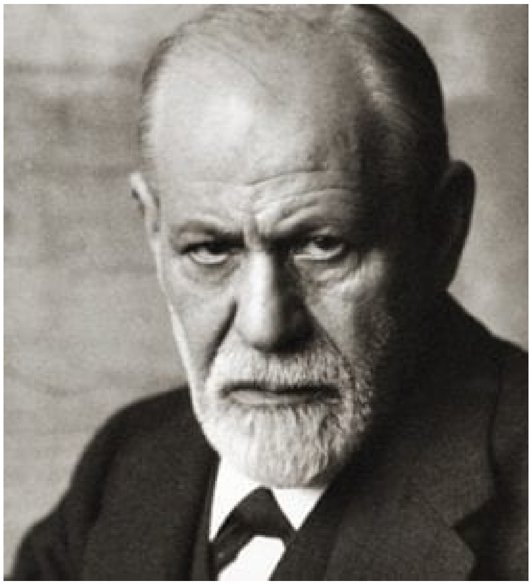
Carl Jung: Pfister will bring his next installment;" Sadger speaks of mucus eroticism," with ill-concealed moral indignation. (2019-06-20 03:41)



Dear Professor Freud, 6 November 1911

The first days after my return were crowded with trivia.

Now at last I can breathe again.

I have discussed the Zentralblatt situation with Riklin and issued the necessary orders. (I have the feeling that nothing moves unless one brandishes a whip.)

Most people are only too glad to have a ruler or tyrant over them.

Man invented rulers out of sheer laziness.

My message to the Zentralblatt' will go off at the earliest opportunity.

The last stretch of military service has made all work impossible.

Reports of meetings of the branch societies will appear as heretofore in the Bulletin, hence the reports of the meetings in Vienna should also be directed to the central office.

I am making up the Bulletin together with Riklin and shall send it to Stekel.

Since our space in the Zentralblatt is limited, we must have reports of meetings from the branch societies every month so that the material doesn't pile up too much.

The reports should be drawn up as hitherto.

Aren't you afraid that the publication of longer papers in the Zentralblatt will generate unnecessary competition with the Jahrbuch.

I'd like to see Silberer's papers in the latter.

The Zentralblatt would be serving a more valuable purpose if it presented elementary didactic articles, suitable shall we say for beginners and patients.

I would gladly vote for a subsidy if the Zentralblatt printed monographs of an elementary and didactic nature, It is, after all, intended mainly for medical men, and Silberer's paper can hardly be called medical.

Anyway I couldn't take Silberer into the Jahrbuch until the January number.

For this reason I am not putting up any serious opposition but merely wanted to express (most respectfully) my opinion that papers of this kind are not quite in the right place in the Zentralblatt.

If his paper has already been lying around a long time its early publication would be desirable.

Rank's "Lohengrin" is excellent."

The next Jahrbuch will include three things of Silberer's," among them the paper Bleuler objected to for some unaccountable reason; I really can't find anything offensive in it.

Pfister will bring his next installment;" Sadger speaks of mucus eroticism," with ill-concealed moral indignation.

Sachs" is in it too.

Zurich is represented not only by Pfister but by two very scientific items" which should lend a quite special cachet to the Jahrbuch from the standpoint of the official, well-behaved (censored) consciousness.

My second part" is not yet finished; I must in any case postpone it till January because of the bulk of the current Jahrbuch.

Not a word from Specht-clear proof of the seriousness of his intentions.

I am shedding no tears for Hirschfeld.

Otherwise all is well with us.

Kindest regards,

Most sincerely yours,

Olga Frobe-Kapteyn and Eranos (2019-06-20 03:42)

Olga Fröbe-Kapteyn was born in 1881 in London of Dutch parents. Her mother Truus Muysken was engaged in feminist movements and social renewal, while her father Albertus Kapteyn (or Kapteijn) was an engineer with passion for photography.

She studied history of art in Zürich and in 1909 married Iwan Fröbe, a musician and conductor who, unfortunately, died a few years later due to an airplane accident. Olga Fröbe was also an experienced skier and adored the mountains: she was one of the first women who participated in climbing the Mont Blanc. During the First World War, she left her home in Berlin to live in Zurich, where she had a literary salon.

In 1920, after having spent several holidays in Porto Ronco near Ascona, she settled down in Casa Gabriella in Ascona Moscia. Here she began to study Indian philosophy and meditation and to take an interest in theosophy. Her first profound contact with symbolism was thanks to a poet from Munich, Ludwig Derleth, who also had a considerable influence on the birth of Eranos.

Olga Fröbe-Kapteyn met Carl Gustav Jung for the first time at the ’School of Wisdom’ , run in Darmstadt by Count Hermann Keyserling, where she found a group of researchers devoted to finding the ’common root of all religions’. It was here that she came across the text of the Yi Ching for the first time, translated in 1923 by Richard Wilhelm. He, too, had an important influence on Olga Fröbe’s life. In 1928, she built a conference room near Casa Gabriella, without quite knowing for what purpose.

It seems that it was Jung, whose psychological system was very important to her and to the Eranos experience, who suggested that she use the conference room as a ’meeting place between East and West’ . The name ’Eranos’ was suggested to her by the historian of religions, Rudolf Otto. His human-centered conception of religion and the fact that she thus met other members of the ’Ecumenical Circle’ in Marburg, had a deep impact on the work at Eranos. C.G. Jung remained a fundamental figure in the organisation of the Conference.

In the 1930s and 1940s, Olga Fröbe traveled to European and American libraries (such as the Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana in Rome, the British Museum in London, the Morgan Library in New York, the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris and the Archeological Museum in Athens) in order to pick up archetypal images: she thus formed a rich ’Archive for Research in Archetypal Symbolism’, containing more than six thousand images, which became of key importance to the research of many Eranos lecturers, amongst others M. Eliade, K. Kerényi, E. Neumann as well as C.G. Jung. In the following years, she focused on renewing this particular dance, which was at the same time a modern and ancient ritual. Olga Fröbe-Kapteyn passed away in the Casa Gabriella in 1962.

Carl Jung on Foul Language as a therapeutic tool. (2019-06-20 04:01)

An American woman underwent a Freudian analysis without success.

She had used foul language to her analyst but he had failed to react and he disregarded her behaviour.

When she repeated some examples to me I told her in no uncertain terms that if she were ever to speak to me again like that, I would reply to her in the same fashion.

The patient pointed out that I had become emotional and that was not permissible for an analyst.

My answer was, "But it is human and I have the right to be human too."

This allowed her to emerge from her schizophrenia.

She had become disoriented through the unnatural behaviour of her first analyst; she was brought back to reality by the honesty of my reaction and was cured. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 15.

Carl Jung on how to use Active Imagination. (2019-06-20 04:05)

The initial question to be directed. . . would be: "Who or what has come alive? . . .

Who or what has entered my psychic life and created disturbances and wants to be heard?"

To this you should add: "let it speak!"

Then switch off your noisy consciousness and listen quietly inwards and look at the images that appear before your inner eye, or hearken to the words which the muscles of your speech apparatus are trying to form.

Write down what then comes without criticism.

Images should be drawn or painted assiduously no matter whether you can do it or not.

Once you have got at least fragments of these contents, then you may meditate on them afterwards.

Don’t criticize anything away!

If any questions arise, put them to the unconscious again the next day.

Don’t be content with your own explanations no matter how intelligent they are. . . .
Treat any drawings the same way.

Meditate on them afterwards and every day go on developing what is unsatisfactory about them.

The important thing is to let the unconscious take the lead. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 28-29.

The Truth in the Analytical Process by Solange Schneider [Newly Released] (2019-06-20 15:22)

[1]T
[2] The Truth in the Analytical Process by Solange Schneider

Analyzing the role of truth, secrets and lies, as well as ethics in human relationships, cannot be postponed. The way we deal with truth in our private and public lifes affects our mental health, just as unjust governments affect our personal lives.

The rescue of the truth in our culture is not simple, and the news reports it daily. We must learn how to deal with the chaos of ethics, and the truth must regain its characteristic meaning as a structuring symbol, not only for the individual but also for all cultures. Therefore, the main purpose of this book is to discuss the truth as an important part of human communication, and to explore it as a symbol in Psychology, History, Philosophy, Religion, Science and also in Politics.

The mythology is a way to discover the meanings of truth in the analytical psychological process. The concept of Maat, the egyptian goddess who embodies truth, justice, balance and morality, is reproduced throughout history by several cultures and religions. The principle of Maat must be rescued.

The recovery of truth as an organizing principle of human relations is both an essential and an impossible mission. I find it’s best not to think of this as a mission at all, but rather an organic cycle that we can neither accelerate not slow down.

Carl Jung on "The Bible and the Church." (2019-06-21 03:23)

[Carl Jung on "The Bible and the Church."]

The Church and the Bible If the Nazis had invaded Switzerland during the Second World War, I would have become a Catholic out of protest because the Catholic Church would then have represented the only spiritual power.

That is, of course, if I had not been shot first.

The existence of the Church has its own validity.

Anyone who drops out of the Church loses its maternal protection and is a prey to national confessionalisms.

It takes an enormous inner strength to live through severance from the Catholic Church.

It is a tremendous responsibility to endeavor to entice someone else away from the Church.

Many now stand outside.

For those who are engaged in a vital conflict, a one-sided commitment is always presumptuous.

They are reproached by others for not being humble enough to take from the Church.

This is not so: they separated themselves from the Church out of reverence for the Spirit that bloweth where it listeth.

When Christ is most luminous the Church receives the least light.

The light of the Church is therefore greatest when the moon is in opposition to the sun.

Some examples of editorial slips made by the Church in the Bible: "Ye will be as gods!"

"When thou art alone then I am with thee."

Many patients must grasp that there is much that lives in their psyche that is not consonant with the Church: it is the Spirit that continues to beget and bloweth where it listeth.

One need not always be in opposition to the Church.

The Church is valid up to the point where life goes on.

There are often elements in the psyche that are absolutely heathen.

They have to be domesticated in some way in Christianity, but there are still certain heathen elements that even the Church has not been able to absorb. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, The Church and the Bible, Page 45.

Carl Jung: He who wants to remain true to love must also overcome sin. (2019-06-21 03:41)

I gathered from Philemon's words that I must remain true to love to cancel out the commingling that arises through unlived love.

I understood that the commingling is a bondage that takes the place of voluntary devotion. Scattering or dismembering arises, as Philemon had taught me, from voluntary devotion.

It cancels out the commingling.

Through voluntary devotion I removed binding ties.

Therefore I had to remain true to love, and, devoted to it voluntarily, I suffer the dismembering and thus attain bonding with the great mother, that is, the stellar nature, liberation from bondage to men and things.

If I am bound to men and things, I can neither go on with my life to its destination nor can I arrive at my very own and deepest nature.

Nor can death begin in me as a new life, since I can only fear death.

I must therefore remain true to love since how else can I arrive at the scattering and dissolution of bondage?

How else could I experience death other than through remaining true to love and willingly accepting the pain and all the suffering?

As long as I do not voluntarily devote myself to the dismembering, a part of my self secretly remains with men and things and binds me to them; and thus I must, whether I want to or not, be a part of them, mixed in with them and bound to them.

Only fidelity to love and voluntary devotion to love enable this binding and mixing to be dissolved and lead back to me that part of my self that secretly lay with men and things.

Only thus does the light of the star grow, only thus do I arrive at my stellar nature, at my truest and innermost self that simply and singly is.

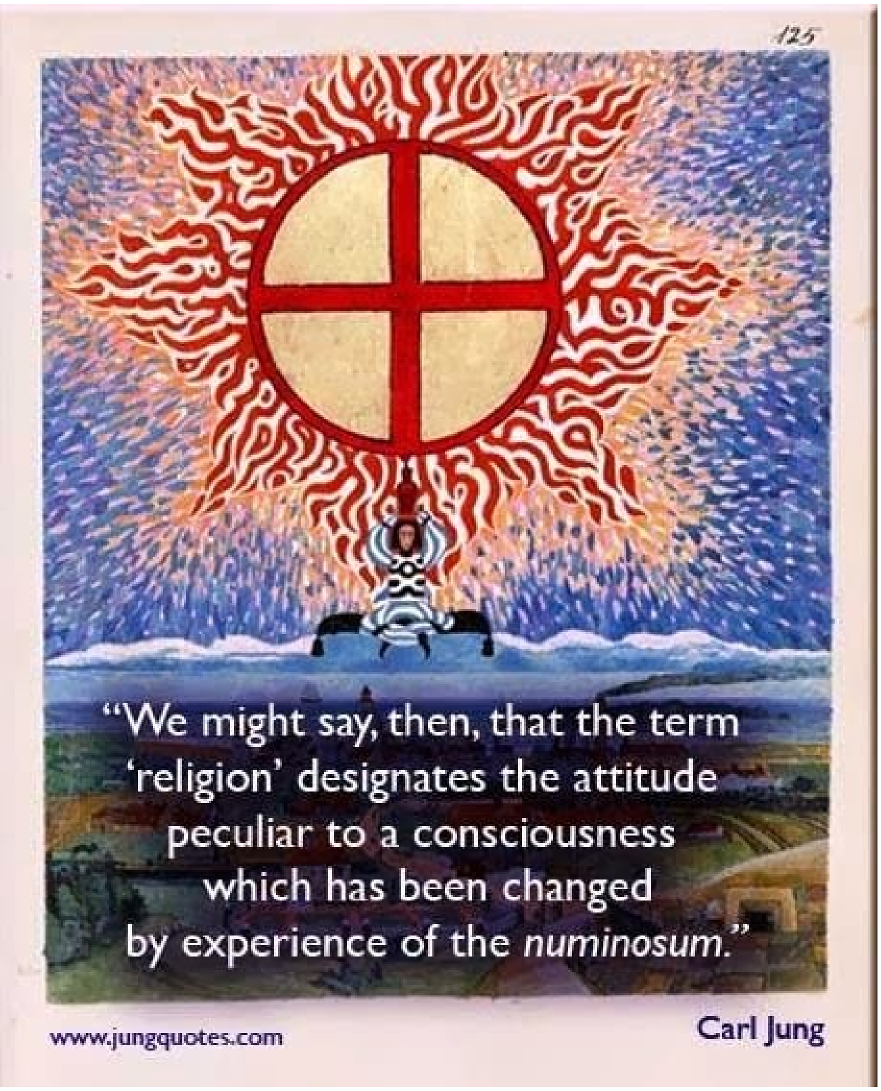
It is difficult to remain true to love since love stands above all sins.

He who wants to remain true to love must also overcome sin.

Nothing occurs more readily than failing to recognize that one is committing a sin.

Overcoming sin for the sake of remaining true to love is difficult, so difficult that my feet hesitated to advance. Carl Jung, Red Book, Page 356.

[Carl Jung on Religion] (2019-06-21 03:58)



"We might say, then, that the term 'religion' designates the attitude peculiar to a consciousness which has been changed by experience of the numinosum."

www.jungquotes.com

Carl Jung

[Carl Jung on Religion]

The inner man has access to the sense organs of God.

God has a longing for man and it seems there is provision for God to be created in man's consciousness.

Consciousness is the cradle of the birth of God in man.

A religious life presupposes a conscious connection of the inner and outer worlds and it requires a constant, meticulous attention to all circumstances to the best of our knowledge and our conscience.

We must watch what the gods ordain for us in the outer world, but as well as waiting for developments in the outer world we must listen to the inner world; both worlds are expressions of God.

There is no general prescription for salvation. "If thou knowest what thou doest, thou art blessed."

I must know what the Church teaches but I must then ask myself what my own law is.

When someone says, in the words of the "Our Father, " "Thy will be done," we must find out, if he is capable of taking both the inside and the outside, the ego and the world, into account.

By "Thy Will" one person may mean only what his unconscious dictates, while another may disregard all his thoughts and aspirations and fatalistically accept all that happens in his outer life.

To some people we must say, "You must choose your own way; you must act."

Others have to learn to refrain from acting.

Few take both into account, which is why Deus et homo is so important.

Imagine a person who only sees two possibilities, two dimensions.

Rest your fingertips on the table.

The person who can only see two dimensions is aware only of the fingertips.

He does not see the curve of the hand above the fingertips combining them into a whole – just as the invisible wholeness of man hovers over and combines all his possibilities.

So it is, that only the individual acts of the person are seen, rather than the whole person with both male and female aspects.

The whole man is standing in eternity and is manifested in time as a manifold: Shiva and Shakti, that is.

The Kingdom of Heaven is a primordial condition like Paradise, but it is later in time and cannot be reached by regressing, only be going forward.

We do not know whether our present order is final.

At another level a new creative solution may be required.

Instead of saying, "God is beyond good and evil," we can say, "Life is both good and evil."

God is understood here as all that is beyond our capacity to grasp, beyond all our imagining.

We see things only in contrast: fullness and emptiness, light and shadow.

So in China God was represented by a jade disc with a hole in the centre; the disc rests in a container like the Host in the monstrance.

The hole in the disc is a way of representing God as the unnameable and the unknown.

The Lord's words, "Blessed are they who know what they do," seem in direct contradiction to the other words of Christ, "Forgive them for they know not what they do."

But life feeds on opposites.

When a little old woman carries wood to the pyre to burn a saint who is thought to be a heretic we might say, "Forgive her, O sancta simpicitas."

We might also say that only he is blessed who knows what-he is doing.

A priori contradictions will always appear in life.

The words of the Bible and the sayings of Christ are paradox.

We too must be paradox, for only then do we live our lives, only then do we reach completeness and integration of our personalities.

To be whole is to be full of contradictions.

The unity never becomes apparent because the opposites within us operate and mingle in various ways and it is their interaction that makes the whole man.

The complete human being, the hermaphrodite, is never visible.

He is indescribable, always a mystical experience.

That which shows itself is always paradoxical so there is no uniform image of the personality.

Biographies seem so unreal because they attempt to give a consistent picture of someone’ s personality.

The visible image of man is that he is both Christ and the Devil at the same time; the image is truthful only when it is ambiguous and paradoxical.

That is why we can also say that doubt is a higher state than certainty.

He who doubts can see both possibilities.

It is pleasant for us when certainty is attained, but is must not last too long for certainty is not life.

It looks as if God was unconscious.

Anyone who knew the goal would not have taken such a roundabout way with creation.

It took a very long time for the brain to appear on the earth. The dinosaurs give the impression of having completely empty heads; then bumps appeared, then much later horns grew from the head, and much later still the brain was formed.

It seems as if there was an urge to create something.

The least differentiated animals developed the most: only that which is incomplete can perfect itself.

Only an unconscious creative power could have worked so hesitantly which is why I think the creative God was unconscious.

This assumption also accounts for the many prehistoric catastrophes.

It does not imply that creation was accidental but that it seems as if its intention was limited in scope.

The bumps and the horns were the first experiment on the head, then the brain formed inside, then warm blood, fur and feathers appeared, and only at this stage did consciousness become a possibility.

If we assume that God was unconscious how can we explain our belief that everything existed as an idea from the beginning of time ?

The unconscious has its consciousness, it reveals itself. through dreams, for otherwise we could not know anything about it.

God holds all of creation in the unconscious: Paul preached in Athens and said, "God scorned the time when men lived in unbelief, 'in agnosia'."

There are several passages in the New Testament that are not correctly translated for us. Metanoen was translated as "do penance" when it should actually have read "change your ways."

"Change your ways" had moral significance for the needs of that time.

If the Creator knew everything in advance history would seem like a badly running machine, misfiring now and then.

God would be responsible for each catastrophe because it must have arisen from his mistakes.

The assumption of divine prescience or of a personal God makes nonsense of the world.

To understand the God-Creator as absolute potential is to recognize a power which is endowed with meaning in space and time and in causality.

Meaning is, indeed, only a quarter of the whole, but when all four come into coincidence, consciousness comes into being.

If God were almighty how could it have taken 400 million years to reach this point from a time when only fish existed, if creation was not an unconscious search and a groping in the dark?

How could we account for these enormous quantities of fish before new beings could come into existence?

This is my myth about God and his creation.

The four aspects, the quaternity of the Creator- God are space, time, causality and meaning.

Human consciousness is the second creator of the world.

Only through extreme differentiation and distance can consciousness come about.

A God who is a God of a people or a God of everything cannot individuate himself and so cannot really become conscious.

God seems to be unconscious: He does not seem to know men. He tries to see them as He is Himself.

Man is also distinct from the angels because he can receive revelations, be disobedient, grow and change.

God changes too and is therefore especially interested in man.

Christian dogma brought immense advances in religious comprehensions.

God the Father became the Son and His own soul, the Word that became flesh.

Each son of God must awaken this new reality in himself.

But then the conflict appears: I am high, I am also so low , and on my right and left hand hang criminals.

If I can bear this I am crucified and must carry this cross and the world as well. Christ is not the Son of the Imperator; he is an illegitimate child of Nazareth "from where no good ever came."

I am a son of God when I do the simplest things; but how difficult it is to do what is absolutely unimportant when I feel I am so significant.

It is a beautiful message that one is a child of God but it can have a devilish effect.

Christ’s tragedy could be much more impressively portrayed in our day than as the figure of a preacher wandering through Palestine two thousand years ago, not even needing to support himself.

But how can we in our day have the idea of Christ in ourselves yet have to make a living as a bookkeeper, to meet Miss Meyer and marry her, have children and be obliged to live with them ?

Imagine an evening at "The Corner Tavern" as Mr.

So and so, a glass of beer in front of him, and in his heart the outrageous claim, "I am the son of God."

How is the darkness to know the light if it does not partake of it?

God deigned to take on the image of man.

We are his eyes and ears, imago Dei in homine.

We must pray, "deliver us from evil," and not only man but God as well must be redeemed.

In the film "Green Pastures" God the Father says, "I must become a man myself" (to redeem them and myself).

We can avoid the penalty of hybris by making a sacrifice .

Each of us must find in what area his sacrifice must be made.

If we can think of the worst possible sacrifice for us we are close to knowing which we must make.

A sacrifice is doing what we would force others to do.

If we hold back through fear of hybris then we fail in our task and become a homunculus .

The acceptance of the shadow is a sacrifice.

For the man who feels himself to be the God- Creator the acceptance of his compensatory feminine side is also a sacrifice.

The image of the Divine Child characterizes our relation with the Self.

In philosophy God is abstract, an idea, imageless.

But the Divine Child is the incarnation of an idea; it permits us personal access to an idea which we could not easily realize without it.

The most serious question to ask, it seems to me, is what will Christianity have to say in the future?

What is the meaning of an attachment to the cross, what are the four functions?

What does it mean to say "He gave up the ghost" or, "My God , why hast thou forsaken me?"

What does this mean for humanity?

What does it mean to say that man dies yet only the risen still live?

All these questions may become actual during the next two thousand years, in the era of Aquarius.

The more one understands wholeness and through inner experience approaches it, the more one quasi resembles God.

"The Spirit examines everything, even the depths of Divinity."

This sentence was an editorial error (in the process of veiling the Logia) which should not have been embodied in the Bible.

We must not forget that we are only ants … but that even an ant is an imago Dei.

I do not know whether Karma creates the ego or the ego creates Karma.   Carl Jung, Ostroski-Sachs, Pages 38-43.

[Carl Jung on the Anima and Animus] (2019-06-21 04:08)

[Carl Jung on the Anima and Animus]

The power operating through the animus emanates specifically from the self, which is hidden behind it, and from its mana.

According to my view the animus can be either positive or negative.

He is like a dragon guarding the bridge trying to prevent us from reaching the other bank.

If we do not try to evade him, but go on courageously he becomes transparent and we can pass through without any harm.

If we run away because the dragon seems too powerful we lose some of our vital energy and become soulless.

Many people go on being soulless for a long time but the bill is presented in the end.

If a woman does not follow her animus she loses both the direction and capacity for development.

A particle split off from the mother’s animus can enter her children and act like an evil spirit.

As soon as the mother integrates this animus side of her soul, her children are freed. The animus which is not realized by the mother is like a part of a soul with a relative existence of its own.

When a mother attempts to live consciously through her animus her son has a chance to avoid becoming a puer aeternus.

If she does not, her animus forces the son to think for her. He is seduced to spiritual heights, finally falling to his death.

When the woman experiences the mystery of creativeness in herself, in her own inner world, she is doing the right thing and then no longer demands it from the outside – from her husband, her son, or anyone else close to her.

A woman should in some way harness herself to the animus (yoga).

She should take care that her animus does not escape because if it gets away from her unnoticed and falls into the unconscious, it can be destructive.

A woman should constantly control the animus: by undertaking some intellectual work, for example: if the woman is an analyst I do not just mean the work she does with her patients, but some other work that she does on her own.

Writing an article or giving a lecture can be helpful.

A woman’s climacteric is a time when one part of the psyche tries to leave the body whilst another part wishes to remain.

One part clings and the other runs away.

If this part falls into the unconscious it becomes a part of the animus.

Hildegard von Bingen transcended the animus; that is one woman’s service to the spirit.

A woman is oriented towards the animus because it is the son of the unknown father, the Old Sage, whom she never comes to know.

This motive is hinted at in the Gnostic texts where Sophia in her madness loves the Great Father.

On the other hand a man does not know the mother of the anima. She may be personified, for example, in Sophia or the seven times veiled Isis.

When a woman feels she is "understood", caution is indicated.

When a woman has a very strong animus she can do terrible things.

Many a woman has been driven to disaster by her animus.

If we try to make clear to such a woman, for instance, that the man she wants to marry has been divorced three times and she is not likely to be happy as his fourth wife, she just remains animus-possessed.

She is sure she is right, because she believes she is an exception.

She thinks she can exert her will upon life and so she runs headlong to disaster.

Some destinies must be fulfilled whatever happens.

When a woman realizes her shadow the animus can be constellated.

If the shadow remains in the unconscious the animus possesses her through the shadow.

When she realizes her animus, mystical generation can occur.

Sarah was Abraham’s legitimate wife, but Hagar, the dark one, had the procreative animus.

Out of darkness the light is born.

If a woman dreams of a superior role she wants to assume in the world, it is best to advise her to write an article or an essay about her wishes, or to read some pertinent books and make an abstract.

She must be taken seriously so that she can keep her animus busy.

She can then see where she stands and what is lacking in order to carry out her plans.

Knights in the Middle Ages paid their "minne" homage to "The Lady Soul."

A woman’s service to a man has a spiritual aspect; a man’s to a woman has an emotional one.

The erotic aspect that emerges from both is only the undifferentiated outer aspect, the primitive outer coloring, the vehicle, the base of the relationship.

The higher aspects of the man’s and the woman’s service to each other are in the clouds.

For a man the archetype of service to a woman is overpowering;for him it is a strong spiritual symbol.

This was understood and cultivated in the Middle Ages.

For a woman the animus is an image with a natural aim; she wants marriage , a child and a home. But a man takes a more religious attitude to this.

A man motivates a given situation in a very different way from the woman on whom he has projected his anima.

A woman usually experiences the situation quite differently.

A man frequently has a beautiful picture of his anima, but if the woman on whom he has projected his anima spoke and revealed her motivation, a very different picture would appear.

The man thinks she is heavenly, a ravishing Mother of God, because he is fascinated and a little intoxicated.

But he has not completely grasped the image of the woman if he has not also seen her icy darkness, her cruelty, her plots, her cold serpent-like blood, her capacity for robbery by stealth.

When a woman sets her sights too high and asks too much of herself we are tempted to ask, "What does she want to escape from?"

She puts herself on a very high level to escape from the dark plans she would really like to execute.

She must be given a cold shower to bring her down to earth from her presumption.

Thoughts from the animus always lead one away from human relationships.

A woman needs to discover the love which clothes sin.

We cannot deliberately sin; we have to be in love in order to sin. Power dominates where love does not rule.

The anima is the handmaiden of the male principle.

The animus must not be allowed to be a possessive demon but must be taken in hand by the woman.

Then it will lead her to her destined wholeness and her self will emerge from it. "God must be repeatedly reborn in the soul."

To a man the anima is the Mother of God who gives birth to the Divine Child.

To a woman the animus is the Holy Spirit, the procreator.

He is at once the light and the dark God – not the Christian God of Love who contains neither the Devil nor the Son.

Primeval history is the story of the beginning of consciousness by differentiation from the archetypes.

It leads to the fire whose origin lies in a crime.

A man on this earth carries the flame of consciousness within him.

Individual existence is the crime against the gods, disobedience to God, the peccatum originale.

Out of this projection of spiritual fire is born the anima.

The coldness of the psyche is in opposition to the warmth of the fire.

The anima comes out of an emotional act, taking place in darkness, the compensation for the crime against the fire; the anima is the compensating element that must be extracted from matter.

It must be begotten by a creative act to compensate for the rape of the fire.

A man needs to be hostile to woman in order to free himself from the "Baubo" that he sees in his mother.

When the Primeval Mother is overcome the anima can become a world consciousness; she must be chiseled from the earth.

The seed of the anima is only productive when man can subordinate his libido to the female principle.

If he does not succeed the anima runs away and the man turns to violence to find himself – to the tormenting of those around him or the boasting of self-importance.

It naturally makes a great difference in practice to a woman whether a man projects a positive or negative anima on to her , but psychologically speaking they are equivalent projections. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung.

Carl Jung on the "Self." (2019-06-21 04:25)

The Archetype of the Self

The ego is the workshop where the self is made.

The self has inconceivable powers and possibilities but it needs a world in which these powers and possibilities can become conscious.

Objects and a world to contain them are necessary for consciousness, a place where differentiation occurs and can be experienced.

The self is always present but does not know it … yet everything must be brought into consciousness.

A saying of the alchemist is, "God is a circle whose centre is everywhere and whose circumference is nowhere."

The saying holds for God, for the anima mundi and for the soul of man.

A variety of forms is revealed through the realization of the self. The self is dissolved into many egos.

When the self has become conscious it leads to "participation mystique."

The self is not wholly personal.

One has one's own personal view of it, but at the same time it is also, in a sense, more general.

It is also the self of others, being greater than the individual.

A man is both, ego and self. The ego recedes more and more to make room for the self, changing the individual until the ego has disappeared.

The spiritual has to be incarnated but to be able to transform the ego into the self requires also a descent into the depths, into the gross clay (as Freud saw), so that everything has been experienced.

When we say "Our Father," the Father also symbolizes that self which is hidden in Heaven, in the unconscious.

The Son (Christ) is the consciously achieved self.

The Holy Spirit is the Paraclete promised by Christ in the Words

"Ye are as gods," or "Greater things will be done by you."

If a man sees himself as imago Dei he should and must make good use of his time.

The ego, the puny man, is the opposite of the imago Dei.

If God is A and Christ is B and man is C, then C equals A.

It is said sometimes that Christ relinquished his divinity and became man.

But that cannot be, for what can have become of the divinity?

I do not know in what relation the ego stands to the self, but the self as a transcendent possibility is always present.

As an ego I am less than my totality because I am only conscious of being an ego.

The self is infinitely more extensive.

The ego is a province, merely an administrative centre of a great empire.

Man is an indescribable phenomenon because his self cannot be completely grasped.

The self is the light of the world; it is the full realization of everything in consciousness.

Every animal and every plant is a representation of the self… Thus the whole world enters consciousness.

We would call the self a multiple consciousness in God, or a spiritual Olympus, or an inner firmament.

Paracelsus already lmew this and wrote it for us.

The self is simultaneously something abstract and something personal (supremely personal, indeed }.

It is like the mana that is spread throughout nature which we can only make contact with through our experience of life or through ritual.

Then mana becomes for us incarnated divine power having the aspects of numen and the unknown daimon.

It is as if a turbine in a power station were suddenly to become conscious and say, "I am a part of this power … but I need water to function and engineers to care for me." Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Pages 35-36.

Carl Jung: I did not say in the broadcast, "There is a God." (2019-06-22 03:30)

I did not say in the broadcast, "There is a God." I said, "I do not need to believe in a God; I know."

Carl Jung, The Listener, 21 Jan. 1960

"Called or uncalled, God is present!"

It is a Delphic oracle.

The translation is by Erasmus.

You ask whether the oracle is my motto.

In a way, you see, it contains the entire reality of the psyche.

"Oh God!" is what we say, irrespective of whether we say it by way of a curse or by way of love. Carl Jung, C.G. Jung Speaking, Page 64.

All that I have learned has led me step by step to an unshakeable conviction of the existence of God.

I only believe in what I know.

And that eliminates believing.

Therefore I do not take His existence on belief—I know that He exists. Carl Jung, C.G. Jung Speaking, Page 251.

John Freeman: "Do you now believe in God?"

Jung: "Now? [Pause] Difficult to answer.

I know.

I don't need to believe.

I know." Carl Jung, C.G. Jung Speaking, Page 383.

I did not say in the broadcast, "There is a God." I said, "I do not need to believe in a God; I know."

Which does not mean: I do know a certain God (Zeus, Jahweh, Allah, the Trinitarian God, etc.) but rather I do know that I am obviously confronted with a factor unknown in itself, which I call "God" in consensium omnium [by common consensus] ("quod semper, quod ubique, quod omnibus creditor" [what is always believed everywhere and by everyone]).

I remember Him, I evoke Him, whenever I use His name overcome by anger, or by fear, whenever I involuntarily say: "Oh God."

That happens when I meet somebody or something stronger than myself.

It is an apt name given to all overpowering emotions in my own psychical system subduing my conscious will and usurping control over myself.

This is the name by which I designate all things which cross my willful path violently and recklessly, all things which upset my subjective views, plans, and intentions and change the course of my life for better or for worse.

In accordance with tradition I call the power of fate in this a positive as well as negative aspect, and inasmuch as its origin is out of my control, "God," a "personal god," since my fate means very much myself, particularly when it approaches me in the form of conscience as vox dei [the voice of God], with which I can even converse and argue.

(We do and, at the same time, we know that we do. One is subject as well as object.) Carl Jung, The Listener, 21 Jan. 1960

Carl Jung Letter about The Ego and Self. (2019-06-22 03:53)

Carl Jung’s Letter to Arvind U. Vasavada:

Thank you for your kind letter and the beautiful “salutation to the perfect Master.” In the guru, I perceive you greet the infinitesimal God whose light becomes visible wherever a man’s consciousness has made even the smallest step forward and beyond one’s own horizon.

The light of the Dawn praised by our medieval thinkers as the Aurora Consurgens, the rising morning light, is awe-inspiring, it fills your heart with joy and admiration or with irritation and fear and even with hatred, according to the nature of whatever it reveals to you.

The ego receives the light from the self. Though we know of the self, yet it is not known. You may see a big town and know its name and geographical position, yet you do not know a single one of its inhabitants. You may even know a man through daily intercourse, yet you can be entirely ignorant of his real character.

The ego is contained in the self as it is contained in the universe of which we know only the tiniest section. A man of greater insight and intelligence than mine can know myself, but I could not know him as long as my consciousness is inferior to his. Although we receive the light of consciousness from the self and although we know it to be the source of our illumination, we do not know whether it possesses anything we would call consciousness.

However beautiful and profound the sayings of your Wisdom are, they are essentially outbursts of admiration and enthusiastic attempts at formulating the overwhelming impressions an ego-consciousness has received from the impact of a superior subject. Even if the ego should be (as I think) the supreme point of the self, a mountain infinitely higher than Mt. Everest, it would be nothing but a little grain of rock or ice, never the whole mountain. Even if the grain recognizes itself as being part of the mountain and understands the mountain as an immense agglomeration of particles like itself, it does not know their ultimate nature, because all the others are, like itself, individuals, incomparable and incomprehensible in the last resort. (The individual alone is the ultimate reality and can know of existence at all.)

If the self could be wholly experienced, it would be a limited experience whereas in reality its experience is unlimited and endless. It is our ego-consciousness that is capable of only of limited experience. We can only say that the self is limitless, but we cannot experience its infinity.

I can say that my consciousness is the same as that of the self, but it is nothing but words, since there is not the slightest evidence that I participate more or further in the self than my ego-consciousness reaches. What does the grain know of the whole mountain, although it is visibly a part of it? If I were one with the self, I would have knowledge of everything,

I would speak Sanskrit, read cuneiform script, know the events that took place in prehistory, be acquainted with the life of other planets, etc. There is unfortunately nothing of the kind.

You should not mix up your own enlightenment with the self-revelation of the self. When you recognize yourself, you have not necessarily recognized the self but perhaps only an infinitesimal part of it, though the self has given you the light.

Your standpoint seems to coincide with that of our medieval mystics, who tried to dissolve themselves in God. You all seem to be interested in how to get back to the self, instead of looking for what the self wants you to do in the world, where-for the time being at least—we are located, presumable for a certain purpose.

The universe does not seem to exist for the sole purpose of man denying or escaping it. Nobody can be more convinced of the importance of the self than me. But as a young man does not stay in his father's house but goes out into the world, so I don't look back to the self but collect it out of manifold experiences and put it together again.

What I have left behind, seemingly lost, I meet in everything that comes my way and I collect it, reassembling it as it were. In order to get rid of opposites, I needs must accept them first, but his leads away from the self. I must also earn how opposites can be united, and not how they can be avoided.

As long as I am on the first part of the road I have to forget the self in order to get properly into the mill of the opposites, otherwise I live only fragmentarily and conditionally. Although the self is my origin, it is also the goal of my quest. When it was my origin, I did not know myself, and when I did learn about myself, I did not know the self.

I have to discover it in my actions, where first it reappears under strange masks. That is one of the reasons why I must study symbolism, otherwise I risk not recognizing my own father and mother when I meet them again after many years of my absence.

Hoping I have answered your question, I remain,

Yours, sincerely, C.G. Jung. [November 22, 1954]

Carl Jung on "Man and Woman." (2019-06-22 04:00)

[Carl Jung on "Man and Woman."]

A man often makes a decidedly infantile resistance to a woman and therefore at the same time to his own unconscious side.

Women and the unconscious are, to him, closely connected and he believes he must save himself from both of them, sometimes in panic.

A man also has a secret fear of a woman's opinions.

Yahweh had this fear of Sophia and yet she helped him to create the world; he took on too much, without moderation.

A woman is more likely to acknowledge her own duality.

A man is continually blinded by his intellect and does not learn through insight.

A woman is necessary to force a man to live in the concrete world. If he has a relationship with a woman he is no longer only an intellect whose wings hover over everything.

When he marries he becomes concrete, is the husband of this particular woman in the world, and has a real address and specific responsibilities.

Love between male and female is only the compensation for the enormous tension between the two principles.

This contrast between male and female is expressed cosmologically in India through Shiva and Shakti.

Shakti creates Maya to make Shiva visible; the female principle builds reality.

The greatest darkness is always felt through the opposite sex.

A woman thinks, for instance, "If he were only different."

But her supposed vis-a-vis is only her own projection.

There are women who believe that man will deflect them from their goals and men who often believe that women want to keep them from their work; yet the real causes are either fear of the other sex or of one's own unconscious.

A marriage is more likely to succeed if the woman follows her own star and remains conscious of her wholeness than if she constantly concerns herself with her husband's star and his wholeness.

A man would not think of following his wife's star because this function of relationship is not developed in him.

He thinks of his own star and of his own work.

The woman must think of herself and although she may be more advanced in wholeness than her husband she must not look back at him, for only then is the way clear for him to follow her.

She must not cling too closely or he will feel like a baby being fed oats.

The wrong kind of behaviour by the woman, can prevent the man's growth.

When an erotic relationship comes to an end, a woman can lose her mind; but a man can also look at other women.

I am not saying this just because I am a man, but because I often hear women complain, saying that their husbands are so true and attached to them.

The woman's intention is to hold onto the man, as this is inherent in the breeding instinct.

But it is not interesting for a man to be harnessed to one woman; he wants freedom.

Evidently Nature has arranged the female psyche accordingly.

Women who live by their instincts only find a man interesting if they are not quite sure of him, if he might possibly run off; such a man is far more interesting to them than one paralyzed by fidelity.

Nature is not foolish and means the woman to exert all her charms in order to hold the man.

Many women unfortunately make terrible mistakes once they are married; they put all their efforts into keeping the house and not into the erotic sphere.

The woman often plays with the hope that the man she loves will fall ill, so that he is no longer able to escape and is completely at her mercy.

In a marriage neither partner sits on a throne.

When there is infidelity and one despairs and believes that life is impossible without a relationship with the partner, fate has demonstrated that one is not grown up and is not yet mature.

It implies an extraordinary maturity for one to be able to renounce the support given by a relationship.

We must be careful not to give up our existence; we must be able to exist alone.

In such a situation the attitude of the person to the supra-personal is decisive and the problem of the religious decision becomes the determining factor.

We can only adjust to the will of God.

We must not establish a power complex of superiority; the important and only problem is how to confront the conflict one self, not what the other person does.

All of nature goes along with a man when his decision in answer to his great problem is right.

All grain means wheat; all ore means gold.

The only thing that matters is what a man does with his problem – what he himself does for himself.

Only when the people involved are dull, or when there are serious material needs, is a marriage free from certain difficulties between the man and the woman.

When culture and differentiation are present, marriage immediately becomes more problematical.

There are some women who unconsciously desire their husband’s death and this wish can actually kill – it only needs a chair that tilts or a rug that skids.

Everything that vitally concerns us but is suppressed and not acknowledged, whether it is good or evil, will be pursued without our knowing – and this can lead to murder. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Pages 51-54.

Dr. Jung’s Vision that is not in "Memories." (2019-06-22 04:05)

There was also a vision or experience - not mentioned in Memories - which he described to Emma Jung and myself very vividly, when I visited him in the hospital during his early convalescence. .

he told us then that as he was recovering from the very worst of his illness, he felt that his body had been dismembered and cut up into small pieces.

Then, over quite a long period, it was slowly collected and put together again with the greatest care. Barbara Hannah, “Hannah,” Page 283.

Carl Jung on "Good and Evil." (2019-06-22 04:10)

[Carl Jung on Good and Evil]

We can only speak of the relativity of good and evil in individual cases.

The categories of good and evil cannot be suspended; they are continually alive and cannot be attached to material things.

Evil is that which obstructs meaningful vitality.

It may show itself differently in each case.

That which is above by reason of its charity, suppresses that, which is below; then the lower craves what is above.

In the Middle Ages the flight to the spiritual world was still necessary.

It was meaningful then to want to live spiritually and give little attention to the material, for meaning was directed towards the spirit.

But it is meaningful today to want to descend with dignity to the chthonic world.

He who wishes to take the Kingdom of Heaven by storm, to conquer and eradicate evil by force, is already in the hands of evil.

The problem that is central and closest to our hearts already contains the lurking danger of evil.

We must therefore beware of impetuous decisions and enthusiastic radical attitudes.

We should hope, very quietly, that things will turn out right in the end.

The Devil can grab hold of the best and most beautiful act and use it as a trick to corrupt man whenever man wants to establish good by force.

This is brilliantly illustrated in Aldous Huxley’s "Grey Eminence.

In spite of His Eminence’s life of prayer, asceticism and personal chastity, the Devil caught him at the moment of his highest service.

At the very moment that someone believes he must undertake a mission, the Devil has him in his claws.

The opposites are indeed very close together.

In the subterranean mandala the fire is at the centre.

It stands for evil and the Devil and, at the same time, the most sacred, the Holy Spirit, the ignis sapienta.

The idea that Lucifer was the most beautiful of the angels also comes from the centre.

The Christian God is God the Father, God the only begotten son, and the Holy Spirit.

But three qualities are not sufficient to determine the world. One part is left out: Evil, or the Devil.

The remedy lies in the fourth part. The Holy Spirit has to come into contact with the material world and beget; He is the new Yahweh standing on the third step. •Satan unlike Christ, was created, not begotten.

When I create I am free and not dependent.

We talk of the ambivalence of evil, but the real question is whether an apparent evil is ever a hundred per cent bad.

We see again and again that what is morally repulsive can have moral qualities and sometimes lead to good ends.

Evil can be either a dazzling or a repellent example for virtue.

We might ask, "Has the unconscious arranged it like this because it knows that in no other way, without this detour into evil, can any good be accomplished?"

A similar situation occurs in the case of the good; we see what often happens to good intentions.

A generous father raises a wastrel of a son. Giving a beggar some money may be the cause of his never working again.

I often have to say to an anxious mother, "It is your damned love and anxiety that are preventing your children from ever growing up"

Those who are always on the look out to do charitable works serve virtue out of their moral cowardice and fall into the worst depravity.

They are really in the depths; they never do evil themselves but force those in their immediate surroundings to commit evil.

Even the Church speaks of felix culpa.

Christ said of Peter who disavowed him, "On this rock I will build my Church."

It is a psychological fact that someone who is disloyal or a liar can be capable of uttering the truth to an extent that we cannot fore see.

When the phenomena of guilt appear we have to ask, "What have I done?"

Yet often we have done nothing but avoided a duty .

Not doing something can arouse guilt even when there is no sin and no wicked deed in evidence.

To evade action is really to bury one's talents.

He who is most guilty is most innocent; the most holy man is the one most conscious of his sin.

Sin is considered to be the opposition of the human will to the Divine will. It is also said to be unavoidable, and there are many examples through the centuries that attest to this.

But if we think that God were responsible for the original sin, there would be no more mystery about sin.

Adam and Eve would indeed have been inadequate people if they had not noticed which tree the right apples grew on.

Man is never by himself; there are always two.

His will is always crossed by a good and a bad desire which unfortunately cannot be combined.

But who says they are not both the same? Our human criteria of good and evil are open to criticism.

Good can grow out of evil and out of good can come evil.

All these considerations show us that we need to revise the Christian conception of God.

The Book of Job could foreshadow a revision.

In the Christian image of God, evil is split off and personified by Satan; in our conception of God only the summum bonum is represented.

Job did not have to suffer for his sins as his friends thought; it was rather that God required Job to look at His dark side as well.

I could unite the opposites good and evil if I could say, "The right is as wrong as the wrong is right.

"Unfortunately good and evil are separate and we are unable to see the whole.

We ought to be as detached from good as we are from evil but this is not practically possible.

At best we can have an idea of this and each of us can ask, "Where am I wrong? Where am I at odds with myself?"

We can seek unity within, not only in our own persons, but also vicariously in the realm of politics – in the great conflict represented by America and Russia, for instance.

If someone has experienced too much evil he has to seek compensation.

Someone who has experienced too much evil instinctively wants to cut himself off from it.

Indeed there are some experiences that cannot be conquered because they have taken a part of our soul with them.

In that case the unacceptable evil has fallen through the bottom of the sack and been lost, taking with it a part of the truth and a piece of the world.

A part of us dies in such an experience.

Those who have lived through limited evil are more easily able to imagine evil and war.

But extreme experiences of war or concentration camp often do not allow conscious realization and have to be compensated for by another extreme position, the extreme good.

If we study the horoscopes of a murderer and his victim we find that the victim has murdered himself. Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Pages 47-49.

The Archetype of the Shadow:

The Bible says, "Whosoever shall say "Racha" to his brother is guilty of hellfire."

If we substitute "shadow" for "brother" and implicate the dark brother within, we open out this biblical word into new perspectives.

It also says, "Reconcile yourself with him as long as he is on the road."

"What ye have done to the least of your brethren ye have done unto me."

The least of me is my inferior function which represents my shadow- side.

But what, if the inferior and neglected function expresses the will of God?

When sacrifice is demanded it frequently implies the acceptance of our shadow- side.

The the poles of the psyche are torn apart and there is no living centre in a person, he feels forsaken and dominated by demons.

His self is empty and he cannot draw the opposites together.

The best protection against abandonment to demons is a conscious relationship to a close, living human being.

In the case of a woman the relationship should be to a man.

We should not try to escape upward or downward from the world.

To want to be the best or the worst of men is megalomania.

It is devilish arrogance to want to destroy ourselves whenever we feel profoundly miserable.

That state of consciousness which will not let us admit to having a shadow pushes his surroundings into a position of inferiority.

All "good people" suffer from irritability.

We must be charitable to our weaknesses.

An alchemical text says: "The mind should learn compassionate love for the body."

The unconscious shows us the face that we turn towards it.

It smiles if we are friendly to it; but if we neglect it, it makes faces at us.

We can only become real by accepting our sexuality and not denying it through saintliness.

We must descend into our own depths to have the visio Dei.

There are always people who want to bring light into the world because they are afraid to reach down into their own dirt.

But who can be humble who has not sinned?

This is why sin is so important; this is why it is said that God loves the sinner more than ninety-nine righteous men.

The meaning of sin is that it teaches humility; the Church says, felix culpa. Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Pages 25-26.

Carl Jung to his daughter Marianne after the death of Emma Jung (2019-06-22 13:59)

Dear Marianne,

Warmest thanks for your lovely letter which was a great joy.

I am glad you weren't bored with me.

It was a joy to be together with you for a while. . . .

Mama's death has left a gap for me that cannot be filled.

So it is good if you have something you want to carry out and can turn to when the emptiness spreads about you too menacingly.

The stone I am working on gives me inner stability with its hardness and permanence and its meaning governs my thoughts. Carl Jung to his daughter, Letters Vol. II, Page 316.

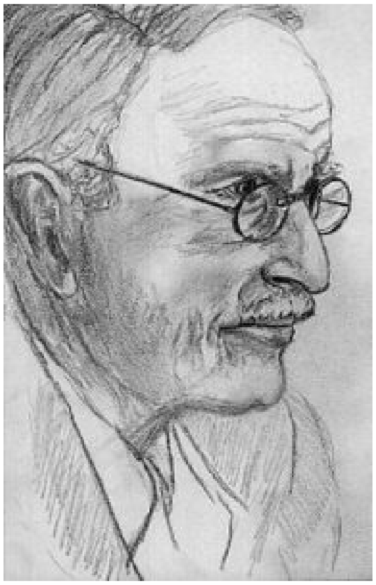
Carl Jung: Analytic "suggestions" merely distort the expression, but not the content, as I have seen countless times. (2019-06-22 14:26)



From Dr. Loy 16 February 1913

You write that a sound knowledge of the literature is necessary for an introduction to psychoanalysis.

I agree, but with one reservation: the more one reads of it the more clearly one sees how many contradictions there are among the different writers, and less and less does one know—until one has had sufficient personal experience—to which view to give adherence, since quite frequently assertions are made without any proof.

For example, I had thought (strengthened in this view by my own experience of suggestion therapy) that the transference to the analyst might be an essential condition of the patient’s cure.

But you write: "We psychoanalysts do not bank on the patient’s faith, but on his criticism" As against this Stekel writes ("Ausgange der psychoanalytischen Kuren," Zentralblatt fur Psychoanalyse, III, 1912-13, p. 176): "Love for the analyst can become a force conducive to recovery.

Neurotics never get well for love of themselves, they get well for love of the analyst. They do it to please him ..."

Here again, surely, the accent is on the power of suggestion? And yet Stekel, too, thinks he is a psychoanalyst pure and simple.

On the other hand you remark in your letter of January 28: "The personality of the analyst is one of the main factors in the cure."

Should not this be translated as:

When the analyst inspires respect in the patient and is worthy of his love, the patient will follow his example in order to please him, and will endeavour to get over his neurosis so as to fulfil his human duties in the widest sense of the word?

I think one can only emerge from all this uncertainty when one has gained sufficient personal experience, and then one will also know which procedure is best suited to one’s own personality and gives the best therapeutic results.

This is another reason for submitting to an analysis oneself, to find out what one is.

I am very much in agreement with your definition of psychoanalysis in its negative sense: psychoanalysis is neither an anamnesis nor a method of examination like an intelligence test, nor yet a psychocatharsis.

But your definition in the positive sense, that "psychoanalysis is a method for discovering the line of least resistance in the development of a harmonious personality," seems to me to apply only to the laziness of the patient, but not to the releasing of sublimated libido for a new aim in life.

You say that in neurosis there is no uniform direction because contrary tendencies prevent psychic adaptation.

True, but will not psychic adaptation turn out quite differently according to whether the patient, now cured, re-directs his life simply to the avoidance of pain (line of least resistance) or to the attainment of the greatest pleasure?

In the first case he would be more passive, and would simply reconcile himself to the "soberness of reality" (Stekel, p. 187).

In the second case he would be "filled with enthusiasm" for something or other, or for some person.

But what determines whether he will be more active or more passive in his "second" life?

In your opinion, does this determining factor appear spontaneously in the course of analysis, and should the analyst carefully avoid tilting the balance to one side or the other by his influence?

Or will he, if he does not refrain from canalizing the patient's libido in a definite direction, have to renounce the right to be called a psychoanalyst at all,

and is he to be regarded as a "moderate" or a "radical"? (Fiirt-muller, "Wandlungen in der Freud'schen Schule," Zentralblatt, III, p. 191.) But I think you have already answered this question in advance when you write in your letter of February 11 "Any interference on the part of the analyst is a gross mistake in technique. So-called chance is the law and order of psychoanalysis."

But, torn from its context, perhaps this sentence does not quite give your whole meaning.

With regard to enlightening the patient about the psychoanalytic method before beginning the analysis, you appear to be in agreement with Freud and Stekel: better too little than too much.

For knowledge pumped into a patient remains half-knowledge anyway, and half-knowledge begets "wanting to know better," which only impedes progress.

So, after a brief explanation, first let the patient talk, pointing out a connection here and there, then, after the conscious material is exhausted, go on to the dreams.

But here another obstacle stands in my way, which I have already mentioned at our interview: you find the patient adopting the tone, language, or jargon of the analyst (whether from conscious imitation, transference, or plain defiance, so as to fight the analyst with his own weapons)—how then can you prevent his starting to produce all manner of fantasies as supposedly real traumata of early childhood, and dreams which are supposedly spontaneous but in reality, whether directly or indirectly, albeit involuntarily, are suggested }

I told you at the time that Forel (in Der Hypnotismus) made his patients dream just what he wanted, and I myself have easily repeated this experiment.

But if the analyst wants to suggest nothing, must he keep silent most of the time and let the patient talk—except that, when interpreting the dreams, he may put his own interpretation to the patient?

From Dr. Jung 18 February 1913

I cannot but agree with your observation that confusion reigns in psychoanalytic literature.

Just at this moment different points of view are developing in the theoretical assessment of analytic results, not to mention the many individual deviations.

Over against Freud’s almost entirely causal conception there has developed, apparently in absolute contradiction to Freud, Adler’s purely finalist view, though in reality it is an essential complement to Freud’s theory.

I hold rather to a middle course, taking account of both standpoints.

It is not surprising that great disagreement prevails with regard to the ultimate questions of psychoanalysis when you consider how difficult they are.

In particular, the problem of the therapeutic effect of psychoanalysis is bound up with the most difficult questions of all, so that it would indeed be astonishing if we had already reached final certitude.

Stekel’s remark is very characteristic.

What he says about love for the analyst is obviously true, but it is simply a statement of fact and not a goal or a guiding principle of analytical therapy.

If it were the goal, many cures, it is true, would be possible, but also many failures might result which could be avoided.

The goal is to educate the patient in such a way that he will get well for his own sake and by reason of his own determination, and not in order to procure his analyst some kind of advantage—though of course it would be absurd from the therapeutic standpoint not to allow the patient to get well because he simply wants to do his analyst a good turn.

The patient should know what he is doing, that’s all. It is not for us to prescribe for him the ways by which he should get well.

Naturally it seems to me (from the psychoanalytic point of view) an illegitimate use of suggestive influence if the patient is forced to get well out of love for his analyst.

This kind of coercion sometimes takes a bitter revenge. The "you must and shall be saved" attitude is no more to be commended in the therapy of the neuroses than in any other department of life.

Besides, it contradicts the principles of analytic treatment, which shuns all coercion and tries to let everything grow up from within.

I am not opposed, as you know, to suggestive influence in general, but merely to doubtful motivations.

If the analyst demands that his patient shall get well out of love for him, the patient may easily reckon on reciprocal services, and will without doubt try to extort them.

I can only utter a warning against any such practice.

A far stronger motive for recovery—also a far healthier and ethically more valuable one—is the patient's thorough insight into the real situation, his recognition of things as they are and how they should be.

If he is worth his salt he will then realize that he can hardly remain sitting in the morass of neurosis.

I cannot agree with your interpretation of my remarks on the healing effect of the analyst's personality.

I wrote that his personality had a healing effect because the patient reads the personality of the analyst, and not that he gets well out of love for the analyst.

The analyst cannot prevent him from beginning to behave towards his conflicts as he himself behaves, for nothing is finer than the empathy of a neurotic.

But every strong transference serves this purpose too.

If the analyst makes himself amiable to the patient, he simply buys off a lot of resistances which the patient ought to have overcome, and which he will quite certainly have to overcome later on.

So nothing is gained by this technique; at most the beginning of the analysis is made easier for the patient, though in certain cases this is not without its uses.

To have to crawl through a barbed-wire fence without having some enticing end in view testifies to an ascetic strength of will which you can expect neither from the ordinary person nor from the neurotic.

Even Christianity, whose moral demands are set very high, has not scorned to dangle before us the kingdom of heaven as the goal and reward of earthly endeavour.

In my view the analyst is entitled to speak of the advantages which follow from the ardours of analysis.

Only, he should not represent himself or his friendship, by hints or promises, as a reward, unless he is seriously resolved to make it so.

As to your criticism of my tentative definition of psychoanalysis, it must be observed that the road over a steep mountain is the line of least resistance when a ferocious bull awaits you in the pleasant valley road.

In other words, the line of least resistance is a compromise with all eventualities, not just with laziness.

It is a prejudice to think that the line of least resistance coincides with the path of inertia. (That's what we thought when we dawdled over our Latin exercises at school.)

Laziness is a temporary advantage only and leads to consequences which involve the worst resistances.

On the whole, therefore, it does not coincide with the line of least resistance.

Nor is life along the line of least resistance synonymous with the ruthless pursuit of selfish desires.

Anyone who lived like that would soon realize with sorrow that he was not following the line of least resistance, because man is also a social being and not just a bundle of egoistic instincts, as some people pretend.

You can see this best with primitives and domestic animals, who all have a well-developed social sense.

Without some such function the herd could not exist at all.

Man as a herd-animal, too, has not by any manner of means to subordinate himself to laws imposed from without; he carries his social imperatives within himself, a priori, as an inborn necessity.

Here, as you see, I place myself in decided opposition to certain views—quite unjustified, in my opinion—which have been expressed here and there inside the psychoanalytic school.

Accordingly the line of least resistance does not signify eo ipso the avoidance of pain so much as the just balancing of pain and pleasure.

Painful activity by itself leads to no result but exhaustion.

A man must be able to enjoy life, otherwise the effort of living is not worth while.

What direction the patient’s life should take in the future is not ours to judge.

We must not imagine that we know better than his own nature, or we would prove ourselves educators of he worst kind. (Fundamental ideas of a similar nature have also been worked out by the Montessori school.)

Psychoanalysis is only a means for removing the stones from the path of development, and not a method (as hypnotism often claims to be) of putting things into the patient that were not there before.

It is better to renounce any attempt to give direction, and simply try to throw into relief everything that the analysis brings to light, so that the patient can see it clearly and be able to draw suitable conclusions.

Anything he has not acquired himself he will not believe in the long run, and what he takes over from authority merely keeps him infantile.

He should rather be put in a position to take his own life in hand.

The art of analysis lies in following the patient on all his erring ways and so gathering his strayed sheep together.

Working to programme, on a preconceived system, we spoil the best effects of analysis.

I must therefore hold fast to the sentence you object to: "Any interference on the part of the analyst is a gross mistake in technique.So-called chance is the law and order of psychoanalysis."

As you must know, we still cannot give up the pedantic prejudice of wanting to correct nature and force our limited "truths" on her.

But in the therapy of the neuroses we meet with so many strange, unforeseen and unforeseeable experiences that all hope should vanish of our knowing better and being able to prescribe the way.

The roundabout way and even the wrong way are necessary.

If you deny this you must also deny that the mistakes of history were necessary.

That is the pedant's-eye view of the world.

This attitude is no good in psychoanalysis.

The question as to how much the analyst involuntarily suggests to the patient is a very ticklish one.

It certainly plays a much more important role than psychoanalysis has so far admitted.

Experience has convinced me that patients rapidly begin to make use of ideas picked up from psychoanalysis, as is also apparent in their dreams.

You get many impressions of this sort from Stekel's book Die Sprache des Traumes.

I once had a very instructive experience: a very intelligent lady had from the beginning long-drawn-out transference fantasies which appeared in the usual erotic guise. But she absolutely refused to admit their existence.

Naturally she was betrayed by her dreams, in which, however, my person was always hidden under some other figure, often rather difficult to make out.

A long series of such dreams finally compelled me to remark: "So, you see, it's always like that, the person you are really dreaming about is replaced and masked by someone else in the manifest dream."

Till then she had obstinately denied this mechanism.

But this time she could no longer evade it and had to admit my working rule—but only to play a trick on me.

Next day she brought me a dream in which she and I appeared in a manifestly lascivious situation.

I was naturally perplexed and thought of my rule.

Her first association to the dream was the malicious question:

"It’s always true, isn’t it, that the person you are really dreaming about is replaced by someone else in the manifest dream?"

Clearly, she had made use of her experience to find a protective formula by which she could express her fantasies openly in a quite innocent way.

This example shows at once how patients use insights they have gained from analysis.

They use them for the purpose of symbolization.

You get caught in your own net if you believe in fixed, unalterable symbols.

That has happened to more than one psychoanalyst.

It is therefore a fallacious and risky business to try to exemplify any particular theory with dreams arising from an analysis.

Proof can only come from the dreams of demonstrably uninfluenced persons.

In such cases one would have to exclude at most telepathic thought-reading.

But if you concede this possibility, you would have to subject many other things to a rigorous scrutiny, including judicial verdicts.

Although we must pay full attention to the element of suggestion, we should not go too far.

The patient is not an empty sack into which we can stuff whatever we like; he brings his own particular contents with him which stubbornly resist suggestion and push themselves again and again to the fore.

Analytic "suggestions" merely distort the expression, but not the content, as I have seen countless times.

The expression varies without limit, but the content is fixed and can only be got at in the long run, and then with difficulty.

Were it not so, suggestion therapy would be in every sense the most effective and rewarding and easiest therapy, a true panacea.

Unfortunately it is not, as every honest hypnotist will readily admit.

To come back to your question as to whether it is possible for patients to trick the analyst by making deceptive use—perhaps involuntarily—of his mode of expression, this is indeed a very serious problem.

The analyst must exercise all possible care and self-criticism not to let himself be led astray by his patient’s dreams.

One can say that patients almost invariably use in their dreams, to a greater or lesser extent, the mode of expression learnt in analysis.

Interpretations of earlier symbols will themselves be used again as fresh symbols in later dreams.

It often happens, for instance, that sexual situations which appeared in earlier dreams in symbolic form will appear "undisguised" in later ones—once more, be it noted, in symbolic form—as analysable expressions for ideas of a different nature hidden behind them.

Thus the not infrequent dream of incestuous cohabitation is by no means an "undisguised" content, but a dream as freshly symbolic and capable of analysis as all others.

You can only arrive at the paradoxical idea that such a dream is "undisguised" if you are pledged to the sexual theory of neurosis.

That the patient may mislead the analyst for a longer or shorter time by means of deliberate deception and misrepresentation is possible, as in all other branches of medicine.

But the patient injures himself most, since he has to pay for every deception or subterfuge with an aggravation of his symptoms, or with fresh ones.

Deception is so obviously disadvantageous to himself that he can scarcely avoid relinquishing such a course for good.

The technique of analysis we can best postpone for oral discussion. Loy/Jung Letters, CW 4, Para 652-

Carl Jung on Toni Wolff (2019-06-22 14:41)

Tommy de Trafford, Toni Wolf, CG Jung Bad Ragaz 1937

Jung went on as if talking to himself,

"Somewhere there was once a Flower, a Stone, a Crystal, a Queen, a King, a Palace, a Lover and his Beloved, and this was long ago, on an Island
Somewhere in the ocean five thousand years ago.. . . Such is Love, the Mystic Flower of the Soul.

This is the Center, the Self. . . ."

Jung spoke as if in a trance.

"Nobody understands what I mean" he said, "only a poet could begin to understand.". . .

"You are a poet," I said, moved by what I had heard.

"And that woman, is she still alive?" I asked.

"She died eight years ago. . . . I am very old. Miguel Serrano, Two Friendships, Pages 60-61.

In 1958, Jung initiated efforts to have Toni Wolff’s writings published. (2019-06-22 15:57)

Dear Dr. Brody. . . .

I feel the need to recommend the collected papers of Toni Wolff to your attention. . .

They are distinguished not only by their intellectual content but by the fact that the author had personally experienced the development of analytical psychology from the fateful year of 1912 right up to the recent past and was thus in a position to record her reactions and sympathetic interest from the first.

Her papers also have a documentary value.

Even those who did not know the author personally will glean from them an impression of the versatility and depth of her spiritual personality. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 424-425.

Carl Jung hearing of the death of Toni Wolff. (2019-06-22 16:13)

Outwardly he kept extremely calm, so that both his wife and his secretary told me they thought he had over-come the shock after a few days, but from my notes for April 1953, I see that he said himself that his pulse was still between eighty and 120; moreover this trouble continued for some time.

He had been helped, it is true, by seeing Toni in a dream. .. on Easter Eve, looking much taller and younger than she had been when she died, and exceedingly beautiful.

She was wearing a frock of all the colors of a bird of paradise, with the wonderful blue of the kingfisher as the most emphasized color.

He saw just her image, there was no action in the dream, and he was especially impressed by having dreamed it on the night of the resurrection. Barbara Hannah, “Jung,” Page 313.

Carl Jung's Letter on Astrology (2019-06-23 03:22)

Carl Jung's letter to M. Barbault on Astrology:

Dear M. Barbault:

First I must apologize for being so late in answering your letter of March 19th. I was away on holiday part of the time or else ill. Besides, unfortunately, my advanced age no longer permits me to fulfill all my obligations as I would like to.

As for your questionnaire, here are my answers:

1. The connections between astrology and psychology.

There are many instances of striking analogies between astrological constellations and psychological events or between the horoscope and the characterological disposition. It is even possible to predict to a certain extent the psychic effect of a transit.

For example [Astrological Symbols not included]…One may expect with a fair degree of probability that a given well-defined psychological situation will be accompanied by an analogous astrological configuration, Astrology, like the collective unconscious with which psychology is concerned, consists of symbolic configurations: the “planets” are the gods, symbols of the powers of the unconscious.

2. The modus operandi of Astrological Constellations. It seems to me that it is primarily a question of that parallelism or “sympathy” which I call synchronicity, an acausal connection expressing relationships That cannot be formulated in terms of causality, such as precognition, premonition, psychokinesis, and also what we call telepathy. Since causality is a “statistical truth,” there are exceptions of an acausal nature bordering on the category of synchronistic (not synchronous) events. They have to do with “qualitative time.”

3. Attitude to positions taken by astrologers [etc.]. The first experiences in life owe their specific (pathogenic) effect to environmental influences on the one hand, and on the other to psychic predisposition, i.e. to heredity, which seems to be expressed in a recognizable way in the horoscope. The latter apparently corresponds to a definite moment in the colloquy of the gods. That is to say the psychic archetypes.

4. Qualitative Time. This is a notion I used formerly but I have replaced it with the idea of synchronicity, which is analogous to sympathy or correspondentia, or to Leibniz’s pre-established harmony. Time in itself consists of nothing. It is only a modus cogitandi that is used to express and formulate the flux of things and events, just as space is nothing but a way of describing the existence of a body.

When nothing occurs in time, and when there is no boy in space, there is neither time nor space. Time is always and exclusively “qualified” by events as space is by the extension f bodies. But “qualitative time” is a tautology and means nothing, whereas synchronicity (not synchronism) expresses the parallelism and analogy between events in so far as they are non-causal. In contrast, “qualitative time” is an hypothesis that attempts to explain the parallelism of events in terms of causa et effectus. But since qualitative time is nothing but the flux of things, and is moreover just as much “nothing” as space, this hypothesis does not establish anything except the tautology: the flux of things and events is the cause of the flux of things, etc.

Synchronicity does not admit causality in the analogy between terrestrial events and astrological constellations (except for the deflection of solar protons and their possible effect on terrestrial events), and denies it particularly in all cases of nonsensory perception (ESP), especially precognition, since it is inconceivable that one could observe the effect in a nonexistent cause, or of a cause that does not exist.

What astrology can establish are the analogous events, but not that either series is the cause or effect of the other. (For instance, the same constellation may at one time signify a catastrophe and other time, in the same case, a cold in the head.) Nevertheless, astrology is not an entirely simple matter. There is that deflection of solar protons cause on the one hand by the conjunctions, oppositions, and quartile aspects, and on the other hand by the trine and sextile aspects, and their influence on the radio and many other things. I am not competent to judge how much importance should be attributed to this possible influence.

In any case, astrology occupies a unique and special position among the intuitive methods, and in explaining it there is reason to be dubious of both a causal theory and the exclusive validity of the synchronistic hypothesis.

5. I have observed many cases where a well-defined psychological phase, or an analogous event, was accompanied by a transit (particularly when Saturn and Uranus were effected).

6. My main criticisms of astrologers. If I were to venture an opinion in a domain with which I am only very superficially acquainted, I would say that the astrologer does not always consider his statement to be mere possibilities. The interpretation is sometimes too literal and not symbolic enough, also too personal. What the zodiac and the planets represent are not personal traits; they are impersonal and objective facts. Moreover, several "layers of meaning" should be taken into account in interpreting the Houses.

7. Obviously astrology has much to offer psychology, but what the latter can offer its elder sister is less evident. So far as I can judge, it would seem to me advantageous for astrology to take the existence of psychology into account, above all the psychology of the personality and of the unconscious. I am almost sure that something could be learnt from it symbolic method of interpretation; for that has to do with the interpretation of the archetypes (the gods) and their mutual relations, the common concern of both arts. The psychology of the unconscious is particularly concerned with archetypal symbolism.

Hoping you will find this answer satisfactory, I remain,

Yours sincerely, C.G. Jung

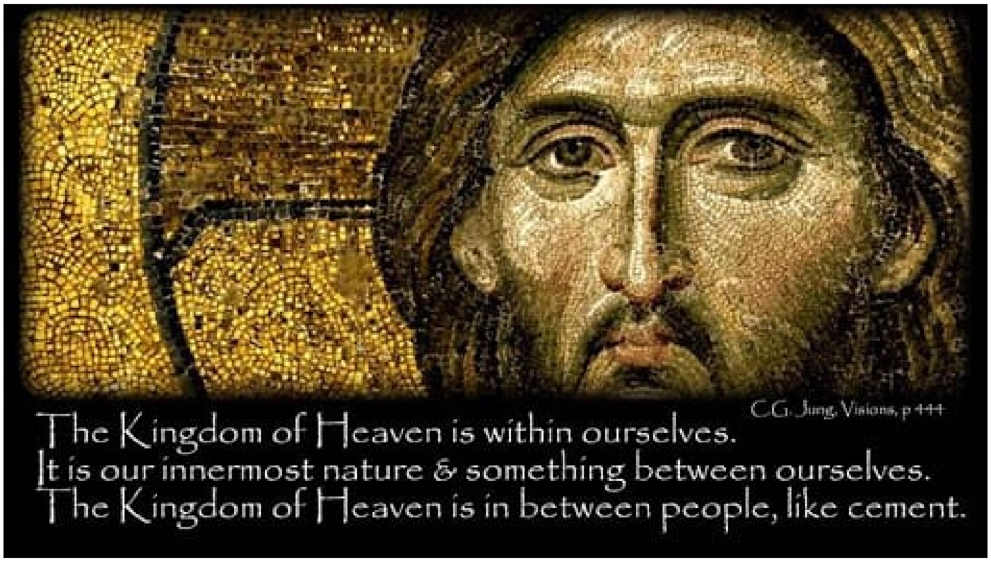
Carl Jung: The Self means the inmost uniqueness and oneness of this particular being, yet that is symbolized by a city. (2019-06-23 03:30)

[1]



C.G. Jung, Visions, p 444
The Kingdom of Heaven is within ourselves.
It is our innermost nature & something between ourselves.
The Kingdom of Heaven is in between people, like cement.

Mrs. Crowley: But that is exactly what I meant. I have been mystified all the time you were reading about it.

Dr. Jung: Then women, thou art forgiven!

It is the light of consciousness, but it is a symbol of the consciousness which is not an ego consciousness.

That collective aspect of the city comes from the fact that a city is never one ego alone, but a multitude, so we are confronted with the most tremendous paradox.

The Self means the inmost uniqueness and oneness of this particular being, yet that is symbolized by a city.

This is an early Christian idea also. One finds it in those famous fragments of papyrus dating from the first century A.D., which were excavated at Oxyrhynchus in about 1904.

In a talk between Christ and the disciples, they ask him first how they shall get to the Kingdom of Heaven, and he explains in that wonderful passage about the animals leading them there.

Then he says: "Therefore strive ye to know yourselves and ye shall beaware that ye are the sons of the Father; and ye shall know that ye are in the city of God, and ye are the city."

You see that is absolutely in accordance with the Evangelical teaching that the Kingdom of Heaven is within ourselves.

It is our innermost nature and not in the least what certain theologians want to make of it, something between ourselves.

To say that the Kingdom of Heaven is in between people-like cement-is degenerate theology.

No, it is the entire man, the completeness, the wholeness of an individual, and that is not identical with the ego; the ego is never the Self, it does not include the whole man.

We always suffer from the fact that we are not conscious enough, that we do not cover what is within us.

Why have we neuroses?

The ego consciousness is too narrow.

Whatever that strange non-ego consists of, it is quite certain that our ego consciousness is not sufficient to cover the whole.

So the symbol for the Self is an idea of a totality that is not identical with the ego.

It is a consciousness which is not exactly our consciousness, a light which is not exactly our light.

That agrees with what I said formerly: that these visions are psychological processes which have nothing to do with the conscious ego life.

They are manifestations of the psychological non-ego.

It is a widening out of the ego consciousness into the vision, one might say, of absolute consciousness, or non-individual consciousness, that consciousness which is beyond man.

This sounds terribly abstract or metaphysical, but it is by no means metaphysical.

It simply means the development of a wider and more abstract consciousness, which relates to the other narrower, more concrete consciousness in exactly the same way as algebrarelates to ordinary arithmetic, for instance, or abstract thinking to ordinary matter-of-fact thinking.

So a higher consciousness is a more abstract and impersonal consciousness.

And our patient's vision of the city beyond the giant is an intuition of that consciousness which is beyond the actual ego consciousness, a more complete, a more perfect, a more detached consciousness.

For in the white city, one is surely in a state which is fortified against the surrounding destruction.

The city has always conveyed the idea of a fortified place, surrounded by walls and towers and moats, where inside one is protected.

But I don't want to say any more at this point about the Self as a collective symbol; our text here does not justify us in going so far.

The vision continues: "I said to the giant again: 'I must pass you,' but he only laughed."

Evidently this vision of the white city is not enough to help her.

"While he laughed many dwarfs sprang up from the earth and tore my clothes from me and I was left naked."

Where do the dwarfs suddenly come from?-what do they mean? Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Pages 444-445 he snatches us from what is outside us.

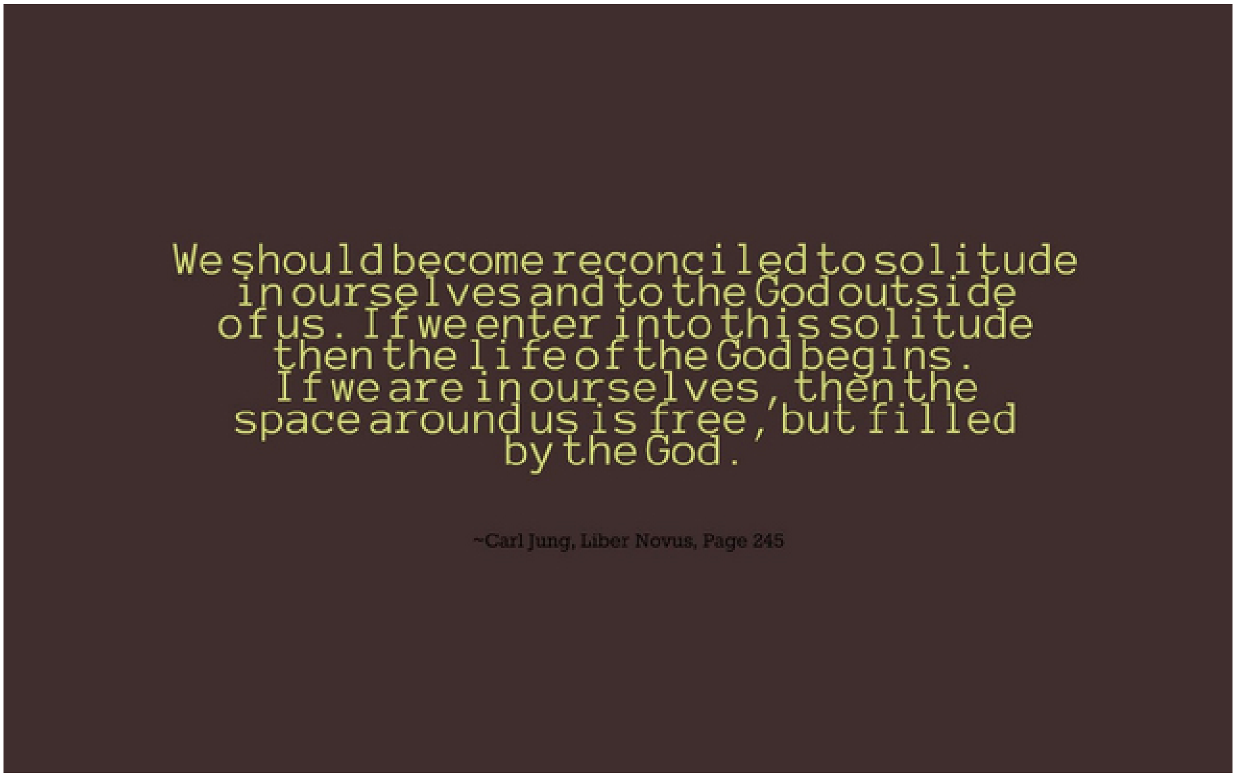
If we set a God outside of ourselves, he tears us loose from the self since the God is more powerful than we are. Our self falls into privation. But if the God moves into the self he snatches us from what is outside us. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 245.



We should become reconciled to solitude in ourselves and to the God outside of us. If we enter into this solitude then the life of the God begins. If we are in ourselves, then the space around us is free, but filled by the God.

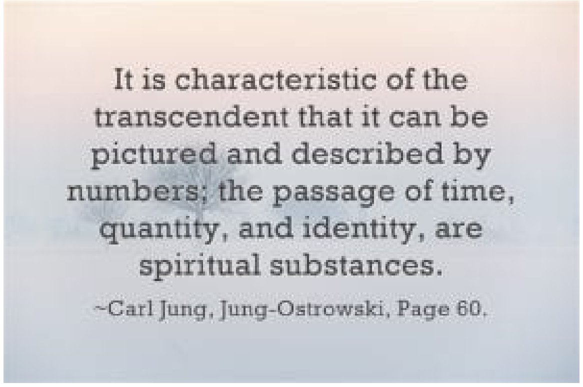
Some Carl Jung Quotations (2019-06-23 03:52)



It is characteristic of the transcendent that it can be pictured and described by numbers; the passage of time, quantity, and identity, are spiritual substances.

The character of the image is not determined by numbers. Pure spiritual substance is eternal. An image as such needs neither time nor space.

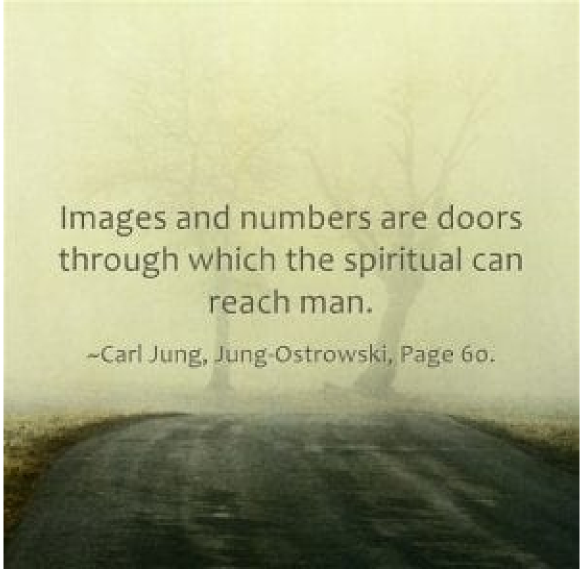
Where numbers indicate a measure we move into the material. A concrete image is a manifestation requiring space in which the spirit clothes itself in the material in order to draw to man.

- ~Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 60.



Images and numbers are doors through which the spiritual can reach man.

Newton experienced a breakthrough into the unconscious through his spiritual isolation. When we leave society and the community of human intelligences the spirits rise from the unconscious.

As intelligent beings, however, we are dependent on human society; the unconscious is no substitute for reality.

Newton was isolated by his discoveries and such spiritually isolated persons are more in danger of splitting -- as Beethoven was, for example, when his music was not accepted.

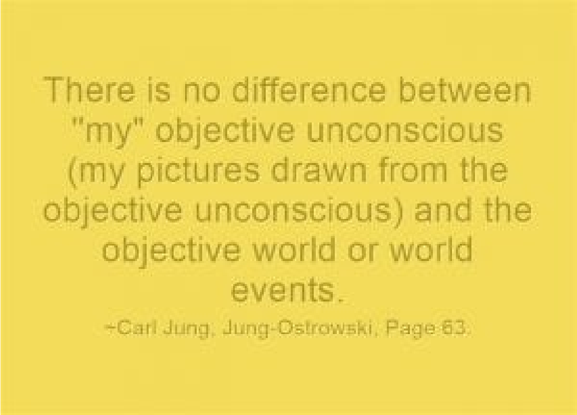
The announcement of an important truth, even with the best of intentions, can lead to an extraordinary mess. That was the fate of Prometheus.

- ~Carl Jung, Jung-Ostrowski, Page 60.



There is no difference between "my" objective unconscious (my pictures drawn from the objective unconscious) and the objective world or world events.

If "it" happens to me I do not have it any more in my hands than if it happened in Russia, in the air, in the house, or on the street.

Whatever happens psychically in me I can perceive, but it is as objective as if it were taking place in Siberia. There is really no distinction; the flow of objective events passes through the outer as well as the inner senses.

The contents of our psyche is a part of the larger, objective course of events.

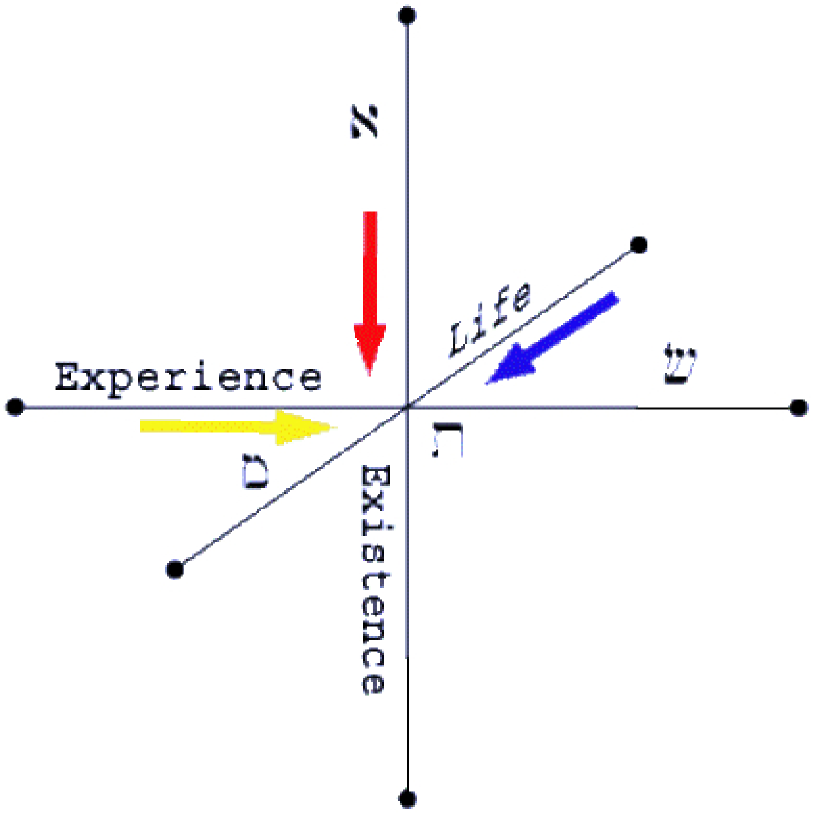
Carl Jung on "Mathematics" (2019-06-23 04:10)



[Carl Jung on Mathematics]

I should like to study the theory of numbers.
What is a number, an entity, a sequence, an archetype?

We think we can perceive and grasp a number logically and suddenly it behaves quite differently from the way we expected.

We are not thinking of prime numbers when we string beads together.

We do not think of numbers as symbolizing laws.

It is a fundamental phenomenon of mathematics that numbers are not just mathematical entities but individualities.

We believe we are playing with equations and suddenly it transpires that certain equations express the laws of electric currents.
God played and formulated currents.

The unconscious creative power concerns itself with the idealized reality; so mathematics has tremendous reality.

It is characteristic of the transcendent that it can be pictured and described by numbers; the passage of time, quantity, and identity, are spiritual substances.

The character of the image is not determined by numbers.

Pure spiritual substance is eternal.

An image as such needs neither time nor space.

Where numbers indicate a measure we move into the material.

A concrete image is a manifestation requiring space in which the spirit clothes itself in the material in order to draw to man.

Images and numbers are doors through which the spiritual can reach man.   Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Pages 59.60

The Hero, the Leader, The Savior... (2019-06-23 04:19)

But, in the end, the hero, the leader, the savior, is one who discovers a new way to greater certainty. Everything could be left undisturbed did not the new way demand to be discovered, and did it not visit humanity with all the plagues of Egypt until it finally is discovered.

The undiscovered vein within us is a living part of the psyche; classical Chinese philosophy names this interior way "Tao," and likens it to a flow of water that moves irresistibly towards its goal.

To rest in Tao means fulfillment, wholeness, one’s destination reached, one’s mission done; the beginning, end, and perfect realization of the meaning of existence innate in all things. Personality is Tao.

Carl Jung: We are men and not gods. (2019-06-23 04:30)

I am a psychologist and empiricist, and for me the meaning of life does not lie in annulling it for the sake of an alleged "possibility of transcendental existence" which nobody knows how to envisage.

We are men and not gods. The meaning of human development is to be found in the fulfilment of this life.

It is rich enough in marvels. And not in detachment from this world.

How can I fulfil the meaning of my life if the goal I set myself is the "disappearance of individual consciousness"?

What am I without this individual consciousness of mine?

Even what I have called the "self" functions only by virtue of an ego which hears the voice of that greater being. C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 381

Carl Jung’s Confrontation with the Unconscious (2019-06-23 04:38)

Confrontation with the Unconscious

After the parting of the ways with Freud, a period of inner uncertainty began for me.

It would be no exaggeration to call it a state of disorientation.

I felt totally suspended in mid-air, for I had not yet found my own footing.

Above all, I felt it necessary to develop a new attitude toward my patients.

I resolved for the present not to bring any theoretical premises to bear upon them, but to wait and see what they would tell of their own accord.

My aim became to leave things to chance.

The result was that the patients would spontaneously report their dreams and fantasies to me, and I would merely ask,

"What occurs to you in connection with that?" or, "How do you mean that, where does that come from, what do you think about it?"

The interpretations seemed to follow of their own accord from the patients' replies and associations.

I avoided all theoretical points of view and simply helped the patients to understand the dream-images by themselves, without application of rules and theories.

Soon I realized that it was right to take the dreams in this way as the basis of interpretation, for that is how dreams are intended.

They are the facts from which we must proceed.

Naturally, the aspects resulting from this method were so multitudinous that the need for a criterion grew more and more pressing the need, I might almost put it, for some initial orientation.

About this time I experienced a moment of unusual clarity in which I looked back over the way I had traveled so far.

I thought, "Now you possess a key to mythology and are free to unlock all the gates of the unconscious psyche."

But then something whispered within me, "Why open all gates?"

And promptly the question arose of what, after all, I had accomplished.

I had explained the myths of peoples of the past; I had written a book about the hero, the myth in which man has always lived.

But in what myth does man live nowadays?

In the Christian myth, the answer might be, "Do you live in it?"

I asked myself. To be honest, the answer was no. For me, it is not what I live by."

"Then do we no longer have any myth?" "

No, evidently we no longer have any myth." "But then what is your myth the myth in which you do live?"

At this point the dialogue with myself became uncomfortable, and I stopped thinking.

I had reached a dead end.

Then, around Christmas of 1912, 1 had a dream.

In the dream I found myself in a magnificent Italian loggia with pillars, a marble floor, and a marble balustrade.

I was sitting on a gold Renaissance chair; in front of me was a table of rare beauty.

It was made of green stone, like emerald.

There I sat, looking out into the distance, for the loggia was set high up on the tower of a castle.

My children were sitting at the table too. Suddenly a white bird descended, a small sea gull or a dove.

Gracefully, it came to rest on the table, and I signed to the children to be still so that they would not frighten away the pretty white bird.

Immediately, the dove was transformed into a little girl, about eight years of age, with golden blond hair.

She ran off with the children and played with them among the colonnades of the castle.

I remained lost in thought, musing about what I had just experienced.

The little girl returned and tenderly placed her arms around my neck.

Then she suddenly vanished; the dove was back and spoke slowly in a human voice.

"Only in the first hours of the night can I transform myself into a human being, while the male dove is busy with the twelve dead."

Then she flew off into the blue air, and I awoke.

I was greatly stirred. What business would a male dove be having with twelve dead people?

In connection with the emerald table the story of the Tabula Smaragdina occurred to me, the emerald table in the alchemical legend of Hermes Trismegistos.

He was said to have left behind him a table upon which the basic tenets of alchemical wisdom were engraved in Greek.

I also thought of the twelve apostles, the twelve months of the year, the signs of the zodiac, etc.

But I could find no solution to the enigma.

Finally I had to give it up.

All I knew with any certainty was that the dream indicated an unusual activation of the unconscious.

But I knew no technique whereby I might get to the bottom of my inner processes, and so there remained nothing for me to do but wait, go on with my life, and pay close attention to my fantasies.

One fantasy kept returning: there was something dead present, but it was also still alive.

For example, corpses were placed in crematory ovens, but were then discovered to be still living.

These fantasies came to a head and were simultaneously resolved in a dream.

I was in a region like the Alyscamps near Aries.

There they have a lane of sarcophagi which go back to Merovingian times.

In the dream I was coming from the city, and saw before me a similar lane with a long row of tombs.

They were pedestals with stone slabs on which the dead lay.

They reminded me of old church burial vaults, where knights in armor lie outstretched.

Thus the dead lay in my dream, in their antique clothes, with hands clasped, die difference being that they were not hewn out of stone, but in a curious fashion mummified.

I stood still in front of the first grave and looked at the dead man, who was a person of the eighteen-thirties, I looked at his clothes with interest, whereupon he suddenly moved and came to life.

He unclasped his hands; but that was only because I was looking at him.

I had an extremely unpleasant feeling, but walked on and came to another body.

He belonged to the eighteenth century.

There exactly the same thing happened: when I looked at him, he came to life and moved his hands.

So I went down the whole row, until I came to the twelfth century that is, to a crusader in chain mail who lay there with clasped hands.

His figure seemed carved out of wood.

For a long time I looked at him and thought he was really dead.

But suddenly I saw that a finger of his left hand was beginning to stir gently.

Of course I had originally held to Freud's view that vestiges of old experiences exist in the unconscious, but dreams like this, and my actual experiences of the unconscious, taught me that such contents are not dead, outmoded forms, but belong to our living being.

My work had confirmed this assumption, and in the course of years there developed from it the theory of archetypes.

The dreams, however, could not help me over my feeling of disorientation.

On the contrary, I lived as if under constant inner pressure.

At times this became so strong that I suspected there was some psychic disturbance in myself.

Therefore I twice went over all the details of my entire life, with particular attention to childhood memories; for I thought there might be something in my past which I could not see and which might possibly be the cause of the disturbance.

But this retrospection led to nothing but a fresh acknowledgment of my own ignorance.

Thereupon I said to myself, "Since I know nothing at all, I shall simply do whatever occurs to me."

Thus I consciously submitted myself to the impulses of the unconscious.

The first thing that came to the surface was a childhood memory from perhaps my tenth or eleventh year.

At that time I had had a spell of playing passionately with building blocks.

I distinctly recalled how I had built little houses and castles, using bottles to form the sides of gates and vaults.

Somewhat later I had used ordinary stones, with mud for mortar.

These structures had fascinated me for a long time.

To my astonishment, this memory was accompanied by a good deal of emotion.

"Aha," I said to myself, "there is still life in these things.

The small boy is still around, and possesses a creative life which I lack.

But how can I make my way to it?"

For as a grown man it seemed impossible to me that I should be able to bridge the distance from the present back to my eleventh year.

Yet if I wanted to re-establish contact with that period, I had no choice but to return to it and take up once more that child's life with his childish games.

This moment was a turning point in my fate, but I gave in only after endless resistances and with a sense of resignation.

For it was a painfully humiliating experience to realize that there was nothing to be done except play childish games.

Nevertheless, I began accumulating suitable stones, gathering them partly from the lake shore and partly from the water.

And I started building: cottages, a castle, a whole village.

The church was still missing, so I made a square building with a hexagonal drum on top of it, and a dome.

A church also requires an altar, but I hesitated to build that.

Preoccupied with the question of how I could approach this task, I was walking along the lake as usual one day, picking stones out of the gravel on the shore.

Suddenly I caught sight of a red stone, a four-sided pyramid about an inch and a half high.

It was a fragment of stone which had been polished into this shape by the action of the water a pure product of chance.

I knew at once: this was the altar! I placed it in the middle under the dome, and as I did so, I recalled the underground phallus of my childhood dream.

This connection gave me a feeling of satisfaction.

I went on with my building game after the noon meal every day, whenever the weather permitted.

As soon as I was through eating, I began playing, and continued to do so until the patients arrived; and if I was finished with my work early enough in the evening, I went back to building.

In the course of this activity my thoughts clarified, and I was able to grasp the fantasies whose presence in myself I dimly felt.

Naturally, I thought about the significance of what I was doing, and asked myself, "Now, really, what are you about? You are building a small town, and doing it as if it were a rite!"

I had no answer to my question, only the inner certainty that I was on the way to discovering my own myth.

For the building game was only a beginning.

It released a stream of fantasies which I later carefully wrote down.

This sort of thing has been consistent with me, and at any time in my later life when I came up against a blank wall, I painted a picture or hewed stone.

Each such experience proved to be a rite d'entree for the ideas and works that followed hard upon it.

Everything that I have written this year and last year, "The Undiscovered Self," "Flying Saucers: A Modern Myth," "A Psychological View of Conscience," has grown out of the stone sculptures I did after my wife's death.

The close of her life, the end, and what it made me realize, wrenched me violently out of myself.

It cost me a great deal to regain my footing, and contact with stone helped me.

Toward the autumn of 1913 the pressure which I had felt was in me seemed to be moving outward, as though there were something in the air.

The atmosphere actually seemed to me darker than it had been.

It was as though the sense of oppression no longer sprang exclusively from a psychic situation, but from concrete reality.

This feeling grew more and more intense.

In October, while I was alone on a journey, I was suddenly seized by an overpowering vision: I saw a monstrous flood covering all the northern and low-lying lands between the North Sea and the Alps.

When it came up to Switzerland I saw that the mountains grew higher and higher to protect our country.

I realized that a frightful catastrophe was in progress.

I saw the mighty yellow waves, the floating rubble of civilization, and the drowned bodies of uncounted thousands.

Then the whole sea turned to blood.

This vision lasted about one hour.

I was perplexed and nauseated, and ashamed of my weakness.

Two weeks passed; then the vision recurred, under the same conditions, even more vividly than before, and the blood was more emphasized.

An inner voice spoke. "Look at it well; it is wholly real and it will be so. You cannot doubt it."

That winter someone asked me what I thought were the political prospects of the world in the near future.

I replied that I had no thoughts on the matter, but that I saw rivers of blood.

I asked myself whether these visions pointed to a revolution, but could not really imagine anything of the sort.

And so I drew the conclusion that they had to do with me myself, and decided that I was menaced by a psychosis.

The idea of war did not occur to me at all.

Soon afterward, in the spring and early summer of 1914, I had a thrice-repeated dream that in the middle of summer an Arctic cold wave descended and froze the land to ice.

I saw, for example, the whole of Lorraine and its canals frozen and the entire region totally deserted by human beings.

All living green things were killed by frost.

This dream came in April and May, and for the last time in June, 1914.

In the third dream frightful cold had again descended from out of the cosmos.

This dream, however, had an unexpected end.

There stood a leaf-bearing tree, but without fruit (my tree of life, I thought), whose leaves had been transformed by the effects of the frost into sweet grapes full of healing juices.

I plucked the grapes and gave them to a large, waiting crowd.

At the end of July 1914 I was invited by die British Medical Association to deliver a lecture, "On the Importance of the Unconscious in Psychopathology," at a congress in Aberdeen.

I was prepared for something to happen, for such visions and dreams are fateful.

In my state of mind just then, with the fears that were pursuing me, it seemed fateful to me that I should have to talk on the importance of the unconscious at such a time!

On August i the world war broke out.

Now my task was clear; I had to try to understand what had happened and to what extent my own experience coincided with that of mankind in general.

Therefore my first obligation was to probe the depths of my own psyche.

I made a beginning by writing down the fantasies which had come to me during my building game.

This work took precedence over everything else.

An incessant stream of fantasies had been released, and I did my best not to lose my head but to find some way to understand these strange things.

I stood helpless before an alien world; everything in it seemed difficult and incomprehensible.

I was living in a constant state of tension; often I felt as if gigantic blocks of stone were tumbling down upon me.

One thunderstorm followed another.

My enduring these storms was a question of brute strength.

Others have been shattered by them Nietzsche, and Holderlin, and many others.

But there was a demonic strength in me, and from the beginning there was no doubt in my mind that I must find the meaning of what I was experiencing in these fantasies.

When I endured these assaults of the unconscious I had an unswerving conviction that I was obeying a higher will, and that feeling continued to uphold me until I had mastered the task.

I was frequently so wrought up that I had to do certain yoga exercises in order to hold my emotions in check.

But since it was my purpose to know what was going on within myself, I would do these exercises only until I had calmed myself enough to resume my work with the unconscious.

As soon as I had the feeling that I was myself again, I abandoned this restraint upon the emotions and allowed the images and inner voices to speak afresh.

The Indian, on the other hand, does yoga exercises in order to obliterate completely the multitude of psychic contents and images.

To the extent that I managed to translate the emotions into images that is to say, to find the images which were concealed in the emotions I was inwardly calmed and reassured.

Had I left those images hidden in the emotions, I might have been torn to pieces by them.

There is a chance that I might have succeeded in splitting them off; but in that case I would inexorably have fallen into a neurosis and so been ultimately destroyed by them anyhow.

As a result of my experiment I learned how helpful it can be, from the therapeutic point of view, to find the particular images which lie behind emotions.

I wrote down the fantasies as well as I could, and made an earnest effort to analyze the psychic conditions under which they had arisen.

But I was able to do this only in clumsy language.

First I formulated the things as I had observed them, usually in "high-flown language/' for that corresponds to the style of the archetypes.

Archetypes speak the language of high rhetoric, even of bombast.

It is a style I find embarrassing; it grates on my nerves, as when someone draws his nails down a plaster wall, or scrapes his knife against a plate.

But since I did not know what was going on, I had no choice but to write everything down in the style selected by the unconscious itself.

Sometimes it was as if I were hearing it with my ears, sometimes feeling it with my mouth, as if my tongue were formulating words; now and then I heard myself whispering aloud.

Below the threshold of consciousness everything was seething with life.

From the beginning I had conceived my voluntary confrontation with the unconscious as a scientific experiment which I myself was conducting and in whose outcome I was vitally interested.

Today I might equally well say that it was an experiment which was being conducted on me.

One of the greatest difficulties for me lay in dealing with my negative feelings.

I was voluntarily submitting myself to emotions of which I could not really approve, and I was writing down fantasies which often struck me as nonsense, and toward which I had strong resistances.

For as long as we do not understand their meaning, such fantasies are a diabolical mixture of the sublime and the ridiculous.

It cost me a great deal to undergo them, but I had been challenged by fate.

Only by extreme effort was I finally able to escape from the labyrinth.

In order to grasp the fantasies which were stirring in me "underground," I knew that I had to let myself plummet down into them, as it were.

I felt not only violent resistance to this, but a distinct fear.

For I was afraid of losing command of myself and becoming a prey to the fantasies and as a psychiatrist I realized only too well what that meant.

After prolonged hesitation, however, I saw that there was no other way out.

I had to take the chance, had to try to gain power over them; for I realized that if I did not do so, I ran the risk of their gaining power over me.

A cogent motive for my making the attempt was the conviction that I could not expect of my patients something I did not dare to do myself.

The excuse that a helper stood at their side would not pass muster, for I was well aware that the so-called helper that is, myself could not help them unless he knew their fantasy material from his own direct experience, and that at present all he possessed were a few theoretical prejudices of dubious value.

This idea that I was committing myself to a dangerous enterprise not for myself alone, but also for the sake of my patients helped me over several critical phases.

It was during Advent of the year 1913 December 12, to be exact that I resolved upon the decisive step.

I was sitting at my desk once more, thinking over my fears.

Then I let myself drop.

Suddenly it was as though the ground literally gave way beneath my feet, and I plunged down into dark depths.

I could not fend off a feeling of panic.

But then, abruptly, at not too great a depth, I landed on my feet in a soft, sticky mass.

I felt great relief, although I was apparently in complete darkness.

After a while my eyes grew accustomed to the gloom, which was rather like a deep twilight.

Before me was the entrance to a dark cave, in which stood a dwarf with a leathery skin, as if he were mummified.

I squeezed past him through the narrow entrance and waded knee deep through icy water to the other end of the cave where, on a projecting rock, I saw a glowing red crystal.

I grasped the stone, lifted it, and discovered a hollow underneath.

At first I could make out nothing, but then I saw that there was running water.

In it a corpse floated by, a youth with blond hair and a wound in the head.

He was followed by a gigantic black scarab and then by a red, newborn sun, rising up out of the depths of the water.

Dazzled by the light, I wanted to replace the stone upon the opening, but then a fluid welled out.

It was blood.

A thick jet of it leaped up, and I felt nauseated.

It seemed to me that the blood continued to spurt for an unendurably long time.

At last it ceased, and the vision came to an end.

I was stunned by this vision.

I realized, of course, that it was a hero and solar myth, a drama of death and renewal, the rebirth symbolized by the Egyptian scarab.

At the end, the dawn of the new day should have followed, but instead came that intolerable outpouring of blood an altogether abnormal phenomenon, so it seemed to me.

But then I recalled the vision of blood that I had had in the autumn of that same year, and I abandoned all further attempt to understand.

Six days later (December 18, 1913), I had the following dream.

I was with an unknown, brown-skinned man, a savage, in a lonely, rocky mountain landscape.

It was before dawn; the eastern sky was already bright, and the stars fading.

Then I heard Siegfried’s horn sounding over the mountains and I knew that we had to kill him.

We were armed with rifles and lay in wait for him on a narrow path over the rocks.

Then Siegfried appeared high up on the crest of the mountain, in the first ray of the rising sun.

On a chariot made of the bones of the dead he drove at furious speed down the precipitous slope.

When he turned a corner, we shot at him, and he plunged down, struck dead.

Filled with disgust and remorse for having destroyed something so great and beautiful, I turned to flee, impelled by the fear that the murder might be discovered.

But a tremendous downfall of rain began, and I knew that it would wipe out all traces of the dead.

I had escaped the danger of discovery; life could go on, but an unbearable feeling of guilt remained.

When I awoke from the dream, I turned it over in my mind, but was unable to understand it.

I tried therefore to fall asleep again, but a voice within me said, "You must understand the dream, and must do so at once!"

The inner urgency mounted until the terrible moment came when the voice said, "If you do not understand the dream, you must shoot yourself!"

In the drawer of my night table lay a loaded revolver, and I became frightened.

Then I began pondering once again, and suddenly the meaning of the dream dawned on me.

"Why, that is the problem that is being played out in the world?”

Siegfried, I thought, represents what the Germans want to achieve, heroically to impose their will, have their own way.

"Where there is a will there is a way!" I had wanted to do the same.

But now that was no longer possible.

The dream showed that the attitude embodied by Siegfried, the hero, no longer suited me.

Therefore it had to be killed.

After the deed I felt an overpowering compassion, as though I myself had been shot: a sign of my secret identity with Siegfried, as well as of the grief a man feels when he is forced to sacrifice his ideal and his conscious attitudes.

This identity and my heroic idealism had to be abandoned, for there are higher things than the ego’s will, and to these one must bow.

These thoughts sufficed for the present, and I fell asleep again.

The small, brown-skinned savage who accompanied me and had actually taken the initiative in the killing was an embodiment of the primitive shadow.

The rain showed that the tension between consciousness and the unconscious was being resolved.

Although at the time I was not able to understand the meaning of the dream beyond these few hints, new forces were released in me which helped me to carry the experiment with ’the unconscious to a conclusion.

In order to seize hold of the fantasies, I frequently imagined a steep descent. I even made several attempts to get to the very bottom.

The first time I reached, as it were, a depth of about a thousand feet; the next time I found myself at the edge of a cosmic abyss.

It was like a voyage to the moon, or a descent into empty space.

First came the image of a crater, and I had the feeling that I was in the land of the dead.

The atmosphere was that of the other world.

Near the steep slope of a rock I caught sight of two figures, an old man with a white beard and a beautiful young girl.

I summoned up my courage and approached them as though they were real people, and listened attentively to what they told me.

The old man explained that he was Elijah, and that gave me a shock.

But the girl staggered me even more, for she called herself Salome!

She was blind.

What a strange couple: Salome and Elijah.

But Elijah assured me that he and Salome had belonged together from all eternity, which completely astounded me. . . . They had a black serpent living with them which displayed an unmistakable fondness for me.

I stuck close to Elijah because he seemed to be the most reasonable of the three, and to have a clear intelligence.

Of Salome I was distinctly suspicious.

Elijah and I had a long conversation which, however, I did not understand.

Naturally I tried to find a plausible explanation for the appearance of Biblical figures in my fantasy by reminding myself that my father had been a clergyman.

But that really explained nothing at all.

For what did the old man signify?

What did Salome signify?

Why were they together?

Only many years later, when I knew a great deal more than I knew then, did the connection between the old man and the young girl appear perfectly natural to me.

In such dream wanderings one frequently encounters an old man who is accompanied by a young girl, and examples of such couples are to be found in many mythic tales.

Thus, according to Gnostic tradition, Simon Magus went about with a young girl whom he had picked up in a brothel.

Her name was Helen, and she was regarded as the reincarnation of the Trojan Helen.

Klingsor and Kundry, Lao-tzu and the dancing girl, likewise belong to this category.

I have mentioned that there was a third figure in my fantasy besides Elijah and Salome: the large black snake. In myths the snake is a frequent counterpart of the hero.

There are numerous accounts of their affinity.

For example, the hero has eyes like a snake, or after his death he is changed into a snake and revered as such, or the snake is his mother, etc.

In my fantasy, therefore, the presence of the snake was an indication of a hero-myth.

Salome is an anima figure.

She is blind because she does not see the meaning of things.

Elijah is the figure of the wise old prophet and represents the factor of intelligence and knowledge; Salome, the erotic element.

One might say that the two figures are personifications of Logos and Eros.

But such a definition would be excessively intellectual.

It is more meaningful to let the figures be what they were for me at the time namely, events and experiences.

Soon after this fantasy another figure rose out of the unconscious.

He developed out of the Elijah figure.

I called him Philemon.

Philemon was a pagan and brought with him an Egypto-Hellenistic atmosphere with a Gnostic coloration.

His figure first appeared to me in the following dream.

There was a blue sky, like the sea, covered not by clouds but by flat brown clods of earth. It looked as if the clods were breaking apart and the blue water of the sea were becoming visible between them.

But the water was the blue sky.

Suddenly there appeared from the right a winged being sailing across the sky.

I saw that it was an old man with the horns of a bull.

He held a bunch of four keys, one of which he clutched as ’if he were about to open a lock.

He had the wings of the kingfisher with its characteristic colors.

Since I did not understand this dream-image, I painted it in order to impress it upon my memory.

During the days when I was occupied with the painting, I found in my garden, by the lake shore, a dead kingfisher!

I was thunderstruck, for kingfishers are quite rare in the vicinity of Zurich and I have never since found a dead one.

The body was recently dead at the most, two or three days and showed no external injuries.

Philemon and other figures of my fantasies brought home to me the crucial insight that there are things in the psyche which

I do not produce, but which produce themselves and have their own life.

Philemon represented a force which was not myself.

In my fantasies I held conversations with him, and he said things which I had not consciously thought.

For I observed clearly that it was he who spoke, not I.

He said I treated thoughts as if I generated them myself, but in his view thoughts were like animals in the forest, or people in a room, or birds in the air, and added, "If you should see people in a room, you would not think that you had made those people, or that you were responsible for them."

It was he who taught me psychic objectivity, the reality of the psyche.

Through him the distinction was clarified between myself and the object of my thought.

He confronted me in an objective manner, and I understood that there is something in me which can say things that I do not know and do not intend, things which may even be directed against me.

Psychologically, Philemon represented superior insight.

He was a mysterious figure to me, At times he seemed to me quite real, as if he were a living personality.

I went walking up and down the garden with him, and to me he was what the Indians call a guru.

Whenever the outlines of a new personification appeared, I felt it almost as a personal defeat.

It meant: "Here is something else you didn't know until now!"

Fear crept over me that the succession of such figures might be endless, that I might lose myself in bottomless abysses of ignorance.

My ego felt devalued although -the successes I had been having in worldly affairs might have reassured me.

In my darknesses (horridas nostrae mentis purga tenebras "cleanse the horrible darknesses of our mind" the Aurora Consurgens says) I could have wished for nothing better than a real, live guru, someone possessing superior knowledge and ability, who would have disentangled for me the involuntary creations of my imagination.

This task was undertaken by the figure of Philemon, whom in this respect I had willy-nilly to recognize as my psychagogue.

And the fact was that he conveyed to me many an illuminating idea.

More than fifteen years later a highly cultivated elderly Indian visited me, a friend of Gandhi's, and we talked about Indian education in particular, about the relationship between guru and chela.

I hesitantly asked him whether he could tell me anything about the person and character of his own guru, whereupon he replied in a matter-of-fact tone, "Oh yes, he was Shankaracharya."

"You don't mean the commentator on the Vedas who died centuries ago?" I asked.

"Yes, I mean him," he said, to my amazement.

"Then you are referring to a spirit?" I asked.

"Of course it was his spirit," he agreed.

At that moment I thought of Philemon.

"There are ghostly gurus too," he added. "Most people have living gurus. But there are always some who have a spirit for teacher."

This information was both illuminating and reassuring to me.

Evidently, then, I had not plummeted right out of the human world, but had only experienced the sort of thing that could happen to others who made similar efforts.

Later, Philemon became relativized by the emergence of yet another figure, whom I called Ka.

In ancient Egypt the "king’s ka" was his earthly form, the embodied soul.

In my fantasy the ka-soul came from below, out of the earth as if out of a deep shaft.

I did a painting of him, showing him in his earth-bound form, as a herm with base of stone and upper part of bronze.

High up in the painting appears a kingfisher s wing, and between it and the head of Ka floats a round, glowing nebula of stars.

Ka’s expression has something demonic about it one might also say, Mephistophelian.

In one hand he holds something like a colored pagoda, or a reliquary, and in the other a stylus with which he is working on the reliquary.

He is saying, "I am he who buries the gods in gold and gems."

Philemon had a lame foot, but was a winged spirit, whereas Ka represented a kind of earth demon or metal demon.

Philemon was the spiritual aspect, or "meaning." Ka, on the other hand, was a spirit of nature like the Anthroparion of Greek alchemy with which at the time I was still unfamiliar.

Ka was he who made everything real, but who also obscured the halcyon spirit, Meaning, or replaced it by beauty, the "eternal reflection."

In time I was able to integrate both figures through the study of alchemy.

When I was writing down these fantasies, I once asked myself, ’What am I really doing? Certainly this has nothing to do with science. But then what is it?"

Whereupon a voice within me said, "It is art." I was astonished.

It had never entered my head that what I was writing had any connection with art.

Then I thought, "Perhaps my unconscious is forming a personality that is not me, but which is insisting on coming through to expression."

I knew for a certainty that the voice had come from a woman.

I recognized it as the voice of a patient, a talented psychopath who had a strong transference to me.

She had become a living figure within my mind.

Obviously what I was doing wasn’t science.

What then could it be but art?

It was as though these were the only alternatives in the world.

That is the way a woman’s mind works.

I said very emphatically to this voice that my fantasies had nothing to do with art, and I felt a great inner resistance.

No voice came through, however, and I kept on writing.

Then came the next assault, and again the same assertion: "That is art."

This time I caught her and said, "No, it is not art! On the contrary, it is nature/* and prepared myself for an argument.

When nothing of the sort occurred, I reflected that the "woman within me" did not have the speech centers I had.

And so I suggested that she use mine.

She did so and came through with a long statement.

I was greatly intrigued by the fact that a woman should interfere with me from within.

My conclusion was that she must be the "soul/ in the primitive sense, and I began to speculate on the reasons why the name "anima" was given to the soul.

Why was it thought of as feminine?

Later I came to see that this inner feminine figure plays a typical, or archetypal, role in the unconscious of a man, and I called her the "anima."

The corresponding figure in the unconscious of woman I called the "animus."

At first it was the negative aspect of the anima that most impressed me.

I felt a little awed by her.

It was like the feeling of an invisible presence in the room.

Then a new idea came to me: in putting down all this material for analysis I was in effect writing letters to the anima, that is, to a part of myself with a different viewpoint from my conscious one.

I got remarks of an unusual and unexpected character.

I was like a patient in analysis with a ghost and a woman!

Every evening I wrote very conscientiously, for I thought if I did not write, there would be no way for the anima to get at my fantasies.

Also, by writing them out I gave her no chance to twist them into intrigues.

There is a tremendous difference between intending to tell something and actually telling it.

In order to be as honest as possible with myself, I wrote everything down very carefully, following the old Greek maxim: "Give away all that thou hast, then shalt thou receive."

Often, as I was writing, I would have peculiar reactions that threw me off.

Slowly I learned to distinguish between myself and the interruption.

When something emotionally vulgar or banal came up, I would say to myself, "It is perfectly true that I have thought and felt this way at some time or other, but I don’t have to think and feel that way now.

I need not accept this banality of mine in perpetuity; that is an unnecessary humiliation/’

The essential thing is to differentiate oneself from these unconscious contents by personifying them, and at the same time to bring them into relationship with consciousness.

That is the technique for stripping them of their power.

It is not too difficult to personify them, as they always possess a certain degree of autonomy, a separate identity of their own.

Their autonomy is a most uncomfortable thing to reconcile oneself to, and yet the very fact that the unconscious presents itself in that way gives us the best means of handling it.

What the anima said seemed to me full of a deep cunning.

If I had taken these fantasies of the unconscious as art, they would have carried no more conviction than visual perceptions, as if I were watching a movie.

I would have felt no moral obligation toward them.

The anima might then have easily seduced me into believing that I was a misunderstood artist, and that my so-called artistic nature gave me the right to neglect reality.

If I had followed her voice, she would in all probability have said to me one day, "Do you imagine the nonsense you’re engaged in is really art? Not a bit."

Thus the insinuations of the anima, the mouthpiece of the unconscious, can utterly destroy a man.

In the final analysis the decisive factor is always consciousness, which can understand the manifestations of the unconscious and take up a position toward them.

But the anima has a positive aspect as well.

It is she who communicates the images of the unconscious to the conscious mind, and that is what I chiefly valued her for.

For decades I always turned to the anima when I felt that my emotional behavior was disturbed, and that something had been constellated in the unconscious.

I would then ask the anima: "Now what are you up to? What do you see? I should like to know."

After some resistance she regularly produced an image.

As soon as the image was there, the unrest or the sense of oppression vanished.

The whole energy of these emotions was transformed into interest in and curiosity about the image.

I would speak with the anima about the images she communicated to me, for I had to try to understand them as best I could, just like a dream.

Today I no longer need these conversations with the anima, for I no longer have such emotions.

But if I did have them, I would deal with them in the same way.

Today I am directly conscious of the anima’s ideas because I have learned to accept the contents of the unconscious and to understand them.

I know how I must behave toward the inner images.

I can read then meaning directly from my dreams, and therefore no longer need a mediator to communicate them.

I wrote these fantasies down first in the Black Book; later, I transferred them to the Red Book, which I also embellished with drawings.

It contains most of my mandala drawings.

In the Red Book I tried an esthetic elaboration of my fantasies, but never finished it, I became aware that I had not yet found the right language, that I still had to translate it into something else.

Therefore I gave up this estheticizing tendency in good time, in favor of a rigorous process of understanding.

I saw that so much fantasy needed firm ground underfoot, and that I must first return wholly to reality.

For me, reality meant scientific comprehension.

I had to draw concrete conclusions from the insights the unconscious had given me and that task was to become a Me work.

It is of course ironical that I, a psychiatrist, should at almost every step of my experiment have run into the same psychic material which is the stuff of psychosis and is found in the insane.

This is the fund of unconscious images which fatally confuse the mental patient.

But it is also the matrix of a mythopoeic imagination which has vanished from our rational age.

Though such imagination is present everywhere, it is both tabooed and dreaded, so that it even appears to be a risky experiment or a questionable adventure to entrust oneself to die uncertain path that leads into the depths of the unconscious.

It is considered the path of error, of equivocation and misunderstanding. I am reminded of Goethe’s words: "Now let me dare to open wide the gate;Past which men’s steps have ever flinching trod."

The second part of Faust, too, was more than a literary exercise.

It is a link in the Aurea Catena which has existed from the beginnings of philosophical alchemy and Gnosticism down to Nietzsche’s Zarathustra.

Unpopular, ambiguous, and dangerous, it is a voyage of discovery to the other pole of the world.

Particularly at this time, when I was working on the fantasies, I needed a point of support in "this world," and I may say that my family and my professional work were that to me.

It was most essential for me to have a normal life in the real world as a counterpoise to that strange inner world.

My family and my profession remained the base to which I could always return, assuring me that I was an actually existing, ordinary person.

The unconscious contents could have driven me out of my wits.

But my family, and the knowledge: I have a medical diploma from a Swiss university, I must help my patients, I have a wife and five children, I live at 228 Seestrasse in Kiisnacht these were actualities which made demands upon me and proved to me again and again that I really existed, that I was not a blank page whirling about in the winds of the spirit, like Nietzsche.

Nietzsche had lost the ground under his feet because he possessed nothing more than the inner world of his thoughts which incidentally possessed him more than he it.

He was uprooted and hovered above the earth, and therefore he succumbed to exaggeration and irreality.

For me, such irreality was the quintessence of horror, for I aimed, after all, at this world and this Me.

No matter how deeply absorbed or how blown about I was, I always knew that everything I was experiencing was ultimately directed at this real life of mine.

I meant to meet its obligations and fulfill its meanings.

My watchword was: Hie Rhodus, hie salta!

Thus my family and my profession always remained a joyful reality and a guarantee that I also had a normal existence.

Very gradually the outlines of an inner change began making their appearance within me.

In 1916 I felt an urge to give shape to something. I was compelled from within, as it were, to formulate and express what might have been said by Philemon.

This was how the Septem Sermones ad Mortuos with its peculiar language came into being.

It began with a restlessness, but I did not know what it meant or what "they” wanted of me.

There was an ominous atmosphere all around me.

I had the strange feeling that the air was filled with ghostly entities.

Then it was as if my house began to be haunted.

My eldest daughter saw a white figure passing through the room.

My second daughter, independently of her elder sister, related that twice in the night her blanket had been snatched away; and that same night my nine-year-old son had an anxiety dream.

In the morning he asked his mother for crayons, and he, who ordinarily never drew, now made a picture of his dream.

He called it "The Picture of the Fisherman"

Through the middle of the picture ran a river, and a fisherman with a rod was standing on the shore.

He had caught a fish.

On the fisherman’s head was a chimney from which flames were leaping and smoke rising.

From the other side of the river the devil came flying through tie air.

He was cursing because his fish had been stolen.

But above the fisherman hovered an angel who said, *You cannot do anything to him; he only catches the bad fish!’

My son drew this picture on a Saturday.

Around five o’clock in the afternoon on Sunday the front doorbell began ringing frantically.

It was a bright summer day; the two maids were in the kitchen, from which the open square outside the front door could be seen.

Everyone immediately looked to see who was there, but there was no one in sight.

I was sitting near the doorbell, and not only heard it but saw it moving.

We all simply stared at one another.

The atmosphere was thick, believe me! Then I knew that something had to happen.

The whole house was filled as if there were a crowd present, crammed full of spirits.

They were packed deep right up to the door, and the air was so thick it was scarcely possible to breathe.

As for myself, I was all a-quiver with the question: "For God’s sake, what in the world is this?"

Then they cried out in chorus, "We have come back from Jerusalem where we found not what we sought.”

That is the beginning of the Septem Sermones.

Then it began to flow out of me, and in the course of three evenings the thing was written.

As soon as I took up the pen, the whole ghostly assemblage evaporated.

The room quieted and the atmosphere cleared.

The haunting was over.

The experience has to be taken for what it was, or as it seems to have been.

No doubt it was connected with the state of emotion I was in at the time, and which was favorable to para-psychological phenomena.

It was an unconscious constellation whose peculiar atmosphere I recognized as the numen of an archetype.

"It walks abroad, it’s in the air!"

The intellect, of course, would like to arrogate to itself some scientific, physical knowledge of the affair, or, preferably, to write the whole thing off as a violation of the rules.

But what a dreary world it would be if the rules were not violated sometimes!

Shortly before this experience I had written down a fantasy of my soul having flown away from me.

This was a significant event: the soul, the anima, establishes the relationship to the unconscious.

In a certain sense this is also a relationship to the collectivity of the dead; for the unconscious corresponds to the mythic land of die dead, the land of the ancestors.

If, therefore, one has a fantasy of the soul vanishing, this means that it has withdrawn into the unconscious or into the land of the dead.

There it produces a mysterious animation and gives visible form to the ancestral traces, the collective contents.

Like a medium, it gives the dead a chance to manifest themselves.

Therefore, soon after the disappearance of my soul the "dead" appeared to me, and the result was the Septem Sermones.

This is an example of what is called "loss of soul" a phenomenon encountered quite frequently among primitives.

From that time on, the dead have become ever more distinct for me as the voices of the Unanswered, Unresolved, and Unredeemed; for since the questions and demands which my destiny required me to answer did not come to me from outside, they must have come from the inner world.

These conversations with the dead formed a kind of prelude to what I had to communicate to the world about the unconscious: a kind of pattern of order and interpretation of its general contents.

When I look back upon it all today and consider what happened to me during the period of my work on the fantasies, it seems as though a message had come to me with overwhelming force.

There were things in the images which concerned not only myself but many others also.

It was then that I ceased to belong to myself alone, ceased to have the right to do so.

From then on, my life belonged to the generality.

The knowledge I was concerned with, or was seeking, still could not be found in the science of those days.

I myself had to undergo the original experience, and, moreover, try to plant the results of my experience in the soil of reality; otherwise they would have remained subjective assumptions without validity.

It was then that I dedicated myself to service of the psyche.

I loved it and hated it, but it was my greatest wealth.

My delivering myself over to it, as it were, was the only way by which I could endure my existence and live it as fully as possible.

Today I can say that I have never lost touch with my initial experiences.

All my works, all my creative activity, has come from those initial fantasies and dreams which began in 1912, almost fifty years ago.

Everything that I accomplished in later life was already contained in them, although at first only in the form of emotions and images.

My science was the only way I had of extricating myself from that chaos.

Otherwise the material would have trapped me in its thicket, strangled me like jungle creepers.

I took great care to try to understand every single image, every item of my psychic inventory, and to classify them scientifically so far as this was possible and, above all, to realize them in actual life.

That is what we usually neglect to do.

We allow the images to rise up, and maybe we wonder about them, but that is all.

We do not take the trouble to understand them, let alone draw ethical conclusions from them.

This stopping-short conjures up the negative effects of the unconscious.

It is equally a grave mistake to think that it is enough to gain some understanding of the images and that knowledge can here make a halt.

Insight into them must be converted into an ethical obligation.

Not to do so is to fall prey to the power principle, and this produces dangerous effects which are destructive not only to others but even to the knower.

The images of the unconscious place a great responsibility upon a man.

Failure to understand diem, or a shirking of ethical responsibility, deprives him of his wholeness and imposes a painful fragmentariness on his life.

In the midst of this period when I was so preoccupied with the images of the unconscious, I came to the decision to withdraw from the university, where I had lectured for eight years as Privatdozent (since 1905).

My experience and experiments with the unconscious had brought my intellectual activity to a standstill.

After the completion of The Psychology of the Unconscious I found myself utterly incapable of reading a scientific book.

This went on for three years.

I felt I could no longer keep up with the world of the intellect, nor would I have been able to talk about what really preoccupied me.

The material brought to light from the unconscious had, almost literally, struck me dumb.

I could neither understand it nor give it form.

At the university I was in an exposed position, and felt that in order to go on giving courses there I would first have to find an entirely new and different orientation.

It would be unfair to continue teaching young students when my own intellectual situation was nothing but a mass of doubts.

I therefore felt that I was confronted with the choice of either continuing my academic career, whose road lay smooth before me, or following the laws of my inner personality, of a higher reason, and forging ahead with this curious task of mine, this experiment in confrontation with the unconscious.

But until it was completed I could not appear before the public.

Consciously, deliberately, then, I abandoned my academic career.

For I felt that something great was happening to me, and I put my trust in the thing which I felt to be more important sub specie aeternitatis.

I knew that it would fill my life, and for the sake of that goal I was ready to take any kind of risk.

What, after all, did it matter whether or not I became a professor?

Of course it bothered me to have to give this up; in many respects I regretted that I could not confine myself to generally understandable material.

I even had moments when I stormed against destiny.

But emotions of this kind are transitory, and do not count.

The other thing, on the contrary, is important, and if we pay heed to what the inner personality desires and says, the sting vanishes.

That is something I have experienced again and again, not only when I gave up my academic career.

Indeed, I had my first experiences of this sort as a child.

In my youth I was hot-tempered; but whenever the emotion had reached its climax, suddenly it swung around and there followed a cosmic stillness.

At such times I was remote from everything, and what had only a moment before excited me seemed to belong to a distant past.

The consequence of my resolve, and my involvement with things which neither I nor anyone else could understand, was an extreme loneliness.

I was going about laden with thoughts of which I could speak to no one: they would only have been misunderstood I felt the gulf between the external world and the interior world of images in its most painful form.

I could not yet see that interaction of both worlds which I now understand.

I saw only an irreconcilable contradiction between ’inner" and "outer."

However, it was clear to me from the start that I could find contact with the outer world and with people only if I succeeded in showing and this would demand the most intensive effort that the contents of psychic experience are real, and real not only as my own personal experiences, but as collective experiences which others also have.

Later I tried to demonstrate this in my scientific work, and I did all in my power to convey to my intimates a new way of seeing things.

I knew that if I did not succeed, I would be condemned to absolute isolation.

It was only toward the end of the First World War that I gradually began to emerge from the darkness.

Two events contributed to this.

The first was that I broke with the woman who was determined to convince me that my fantasies had artistic value; the second and principal event was that I began to understand mandala drawings.

This happened in 1918-19. I had painted the first mandala 1S in 1916 after writing the Septem Sermones; naturally I had not, then, understood it.

In 1918-19 I was in CMteau d’Oex as Commandant de la Region Anglaise des Internes de Guerre.

While I was there I sketched every morning in a notebook a small circular drawing, a mandala, which seemed to correspond to my inner situation at the time.

With the help of these drawings I could observe my psychic transformations from day to day.

One day, for example, I received a letter from that esthetic lady in which she again stubbornly maintained that the fantasies arising from my unconscious had artistic value and should be considered art.

The letter got on my nerves. It was far from stupid, and therefore dangerously persuasive.

The modern artist, after all, seeks to create art out of the unconscious.

The utilitarianism and selfimportance concealed behind this thesis touched a doubt in myself, namely, my uncertainty as to whether the fantasies I was producing were really spontaneous and natural, and not ultimately my own arbitrary inventions.

I was by no means free from the bigotry and hubris of consciousness which wants to believe that any halfway decent inspiration is due to one's own merit, whereas inferior reactions come merely by chance, or even derive from alien sources.

Out of this irritation and disharmony within myself there proceeded, the following day, a changed mandala: part of the periphery had burst open and the symmetry was destroyed.

Only gradually did I discover what the mandala really is: "Formation, Transformation, Eternal Mind's eternal recreation.'*

And that is the self, the wholeness of the personality, which if all goes well is harmonious, but which cannot tolerate self-deceptions.

My mandalas were cryptograms concerning the state of the self which were presented to me anew each day.

In them I saw the self that is, my whole being actively at work.

To be sure, at first I could only dimly understand them; but they seemed to me highly significant, and I guarded them like precious pearls.

I had the distinct feeling that they were something central, and in time I acquired through them a living conception of the self.

The self, I thought, was like the monad which I am, and which is my world.

The mandala represents this monad, and corresponds to the microcosmic nature of the psyche.

I no longer know how many mandalas I drew at this time.

There were a great many.

While I was working on them, the question arose repeatedly: What is this process leading to? Where is its goal?

From my own experience, I knew by now that I could not presume to choose a goal which would seem trustworthy to me.

It had been proved to me that I had to abandon the idea of the superordinate position of the ego.

After all, I had been brought up short when I had attempted to maintain it.

I had wanted to go on with the scientific analysis of myths which I had begun in Wandlungen und Symbole.

That was still my goalbut I must not think of that!

I was being compelled to go through this process of the unconscious.

I had to let myself be carried along by the current, without a notion of where it would lead me.

When I began drawing the mandalas, however, I saw that everything, all the paths I had been following, all the steps I had taken, were leading back to a single point namely, to the mid-point.

It became increasingly plain to me that the mandala is the center.

It is the exponent of all paths.

It is the path to the center, to individuation.

During those years, between 1918 and 1920, 1 began to understand that the goal of psychic development is the self.

There is no linear evolution; there is only a circumambulation of the self.

Uniform development exists, at most, only at the beginning; later, everything points toward the center.

This insight gave me stability, and gradually my inner peace returned.

I knew that in finding the mandala as an expression of the self I had attained what was for me the ultimate.

Perhaps someone else knows more, but not I.

Some years later (in 1927) I obtained confirmation of my ideas about the center and the self by way of a dream.

I represented its essence in a mandala which I called "Window on Eternity."

The picture is reproduced in The Secret of the Golden Flower (Fig. s).

A year later I painted a second picture, like wise a mandala, with a golden castle in the center.

When it was finished, I asked myself, "Why is this so Chinese?’

I was impressed by the form and choice of colors, which seemed to me Chinese, although there was nothing outwardly Chinese about it.

Yet that was how it affected me.

It was a strange coincidence that shortly afterward I received a letter from Richard Wilhelm enclosing the manuscript of a Taoist-alchemical treatise entitled The Secret of the Golden Flower, with a request that I write a commentary on it.

I devoured the manuscript at once, for the text gave me undreamed-of confirmation of my ideas about the mandala and the circumambulation of the center.

That was the first event which broke through my isolation.

I became aware of an affinity; I could establish ties with something and someone.

In remembrance of this coincidence, this "synchronicity," I wrote underneath the picture which had made so Chinese an impression upon me: "In 1928, when I was painting this picture, showing the golden, well-fortified castle, Richard Wilhelm in Frankfurt sent me the thousand-year-old Chinese text on the yellow castle, the germ of the immortal body."

This is the dteam I mentioned earlier:

I found myself in a dirty, sooty city.

It was night, and winter, and dark, and raining.

I was in Liverpool.

With a number of Swiss say, half a dozen I walked through the dark streets.

I had the feeling that there we were coming from the harbor, and that the real city was actually up above, on the cliffs.

We climbed up there.

It reminded me of Basel, where the market is down below and then you go up through the Totengasschen ("Alley of the Dead"), which leads to a plateau above and so to the Petersplatz and the Peterskirche.

When we reached the plateau, we found a broad square dimly illuminated by street lights, into which many streets converged.

The various quarters of the city were arranged radially around the square.

In the center was a round pool, and in the middle of it a small island.

While everything round about was obscured by rain, fog, smoke, and dimly lit darkness, the little island bkzed with sunlight.

On it stood a single tree, a magnolia, in a shower of reddish blossoms.

It was as though the tree stood in the sunlight and were at the same time the source of light.

My companions commented on the abominable weather, and obviously did not see the tree.

They spoke of another Swiss who was living in Liverpool, and expressed surprise that he should have settled here.

I was carried away by die beauty of the flowering tree and the sunlit island, and thought, "I know very well why he has settled here."

Then I awoke.

On one detail of the dream I must add a supplementary comment: the individual quarters of the city were themselves arranged radially around a central point.

This point formed a small open square illuminated by a larger street lamp, and constituted a small replica of the island.

I knew that the "other Swiss" lived in the vicinity of one of these secondary centers.

This dream represented my situation at the time, I can still see the grayish-yellow raincoats, glistening with the wetness of the rain.

Everything was extremely unpleasant, black and opaque just as I felt then.

But I had had a vision of unearthly beauty, and that was why I was able to live at all.

Liverpool is the "pool of life." The "liver," according to an old view, is the seat of life that which "makes to live/*

This dream brought with it a sense of finality.

I saw that here the goal had been revealed.

One could not go beyond the center.

The center is the goal, and everything is directed toward that center.

Through this dream I understood that the self is the principle and archetype of orientation and meaning.

Therein lies its healing function.

For me, this insight signified an approach to the center and therefore to the goal.

Out of it emerged a first inkling of my personal myth.

After this dream I gave up drawing or painting mandalas,

The dream depicted the climax of the whole process of development of consciousness.

It satisfied me completely, for it gave a total picture of my situation,

I had known, to be sure, that I was occupied with something important, but I still lacked understanding, and there had been no one among my associates who could have understood.

The clarification brought about by the dream made it possible for me to take an objective view of the things that filled my being.

Without such a vision I might perhaps have lost my orientation and been compelled to abandon my undertaking.

But here the meaning had been made clear.

When I parted from Freud, I knew that I was plunging into the unknown.

Beyond Freud, after all, I knew nothing; but I had taken the step into darkness.

When that happens, and then such a dream comes, one feels it as an act of grace.

It has taken me virtually forty-five years to distill within the vessel of my scientific workythe things I experienced and wrote down at that time.

As a young man my goal had been to accomplish something in my science.

But then, I hit upon this stream of lava, and the heat of its fires reshaped my life.

That was the primal stuff which compelled me to work upon it, and my works are a more or less successful endeavor to incorporate this incandescent matter into the contemporary picture of the world.

The years when I was pursuing my inner images were the most important in my life in them everything essential was decided.

It all began then; the later details are only supplements and clarifications of the material that burst forth from the unconscious, and at first swamped me.

It was the prima materia for a lifetime's work. Carl Jung, Memories, Dreams and Reflections, Pages 170-199

Carl Jung: "Buddha quietly turned the disciple's mind to the path of redemption..." (2019-06-24 03:07)

[1]

To Isobel Moore

Dear Miss Moore, 2 May 1938

Buddha was once asked by one of his disciples why all his disciples, though redeemed, didn't possess the wonderful gifts of the fourth degree of contemplation, namely: sitting on the air, walking through walls, remembering their past lives, seeing things in the future, and touching the sun and moon.

Buddha quietly turned the disciple's mind to the path of redemption and let him see how foolish it was to ask for such miracles.

That is what the superior Indian thinks about the claims of the yogins.

I'm not aware of Freud having written an article on yoga.

I have written such an article a few years ago.

It has often happened that my name has been exchanged for Freud's.

Sincerely yours,

C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Page 244.

The most serious question to ask, it seems to me, is what will Christianity have to say in the future?

What is the meaning of an attachment to the cross, what are the four functions?

What does it mean to say "He gave up the ghost" or, "My God , why hast thou forsaken me?"

What does this mean for humanity?

What does it mean to say that man dies yet only the risen still live?

All these questions may become actual during the next two thousand years, in the era of Aquarius. Carl Jung,

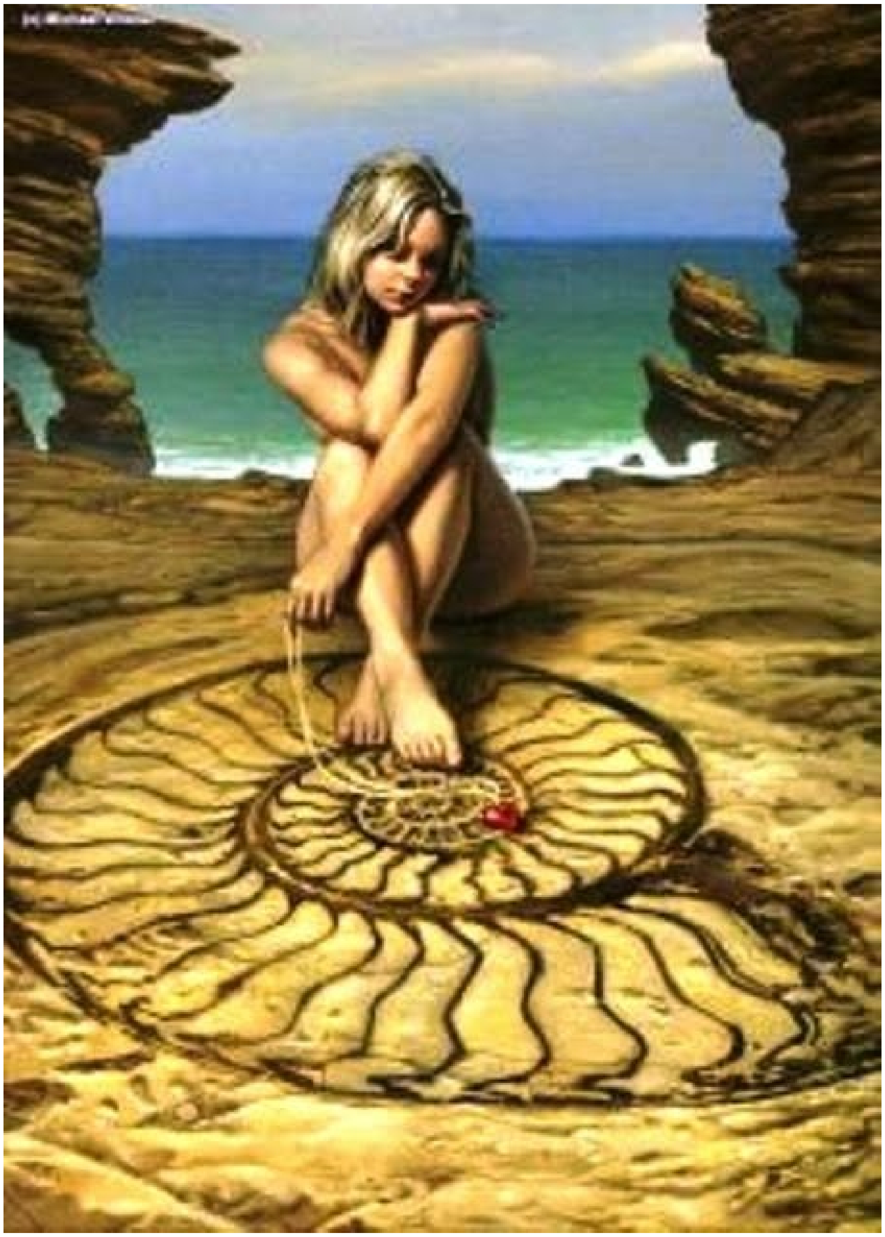
Carl Jung on the “Technique of Analysis” "Treatment" "Transference" and "Projection." (2019-06-24 03:40)

[1]



[Carl Jung on the “Technique of Analysis” "Treatment" "Transference" and "projection."]

1. starting from the neurosis, discussing the symptoms, their origin, manifestation and symbolism.
2. starting from the phantasy material, or from the dream content.
3. free association, which gives the material in a fundamental instinctual route or trend: (a) sexual; (b) power - according to what may be constellated between the analyst and the patient.

All dreams can be thus reductively analyzed to either sexual or power roots.

Freud’s censor is necessary to explain why this material should be disguised into the dream form.

But these basic instinctual phantasies can also be reached by free association from any starting point whatever.

The problem of the patient, however, is often not one of simple repression of the instincts; the problem is rather what to do about it.

This brings us to the question of why the dream chooses particular symbols.

The dream should be treated as an incomplete hieroglyphic inscription; then the patient must be kept close to the imagery of the dream; thus the associations are limited to a circle centering round the dream, and the image of the dream is enriched.

The associations around the symbol will be of a certain type, e.g.; intellectual, aesthetic, etc., thus the basin instinct no longer prevails, but rather the particular instinct governing that particular psychology.

Thus you get at what the dream image is like in the dreamer’s mind.

When this is done the compensatory function of the dream appears.

The dream is compensatory to consciousness; all those things excluded by the choice of one conscious line will turn up in the dream.

Here the art of the analyst Domes in in helping the activity and the understanding of the patient, for the material may be inaccessible to him.

For the unconscious works as the primitive mind does and not as the civilized mind.

Thus knowledge of anthropology, mythology and so forth are needed, e.g. Totem psychology and so forth may turn up.
Technique of treatment.

Things must not be left in a primitive condition.

The primitive even animal part of the psyche is awakened by analysis - this causes great conflict which might even be disastrous; a state of revolution occurs between the primitive and the civilized man in the patient.

The purpose of analysis is to fit these two sides together.

The synthesis must take into consideration the claims of the primitive as well as of the civilized half.

For example’ the murderous instincts of the primitive man in us cannot be satisfied with our moral conscience, thus a symbolic satisfaction must be found.

Again we seek for the way via the dream. The meaning of the dream must be fitted into the conscious attitude, thus acting as a ferment in the conscious attitude and out of that a new attitude is made, day by day.

This irrational thinking is customary in the East, e.g. China.

There followed further discussion of the meaning of the Chinese Middle Way, and our own reconciling symbolism...the tension between the East and the West.

Discovery of the thought of the East came as an enormous revitalizing of the West. Buddhism leads to complete non-existence - quietism is equivalent to our Christianity or Pagan religion; but the ancient idea was to go into an introversion and nothingness in order to come to rebirth and the way.

Two methods of compensation appear in dreams which can be likened to the methods of the puberty initiations (a) by intellectual prohibition; (b) by mimetic instruction with prohibition.

Overvaluation and undervaluation may both appear in the dream as warning or taboo.

Thus it may be necessary to go the wrong way until the wrongness appears.

Transference:

The phenomenon of transference was first described by the Nancy School as Rapport.

It was further defined by Freud who found that the patient who handed out his material clung to the analyst and transferred something to him.

This is equivalent to the idea of the medicine man who takes over the sickness of the patient and by his health disperses or cures it.

Or he transfers the illness to an animal, e.g. the scapegoat.

The patient carries over to the analyst not only his material but also the value of affects connected with it at the same time.
Compare the binding value of a secret held in common.

Persons with many secrets are necessarily, isolated; the imparting of such secrets causes a linking or binding proportionate to the value or importance of the secret imparted.

The dependence upon the receiver of the secret is proportionate to the dependence on the value of the secret, for the patient is still dependent on the secret, but the secret is now in the other person.

If you hand out your material in the wrong place you will suffer from "Loss of soul."

Thus far transference is a conscious phenomenon.

There is also unconscious transference which is in a far less manageable form, for you are helpless because of your ignorance.
This is projection, which is a transference of unconscious products into the object.

The analyst is partly a conscious and partly an unconscious phenomenon, for he consists of supra- and subliminal impressions and conclusions.

Thus there are reactions on both planes.

When we use the term transference in analysis we generally mean the unconscious transference which is a projection and this is unknown.

When you become aware of a projection it ceases to be a projection.

The transference can be either negative or positive, or both or neither, with yet a certain dependence.

The quality of the transference depends on the unconscious material actually constellated by the intercourse with the object.

Neurotic transference is more than dependence on the person who helps.

It is really a substitute for the neurosis.

The patient projects onto the analyst all the material, the phantasy and other morbid materiel, that is, all the basis of his neurosis; thus the doctor becomes, as it were, his neurosis, the patient therefore suffers from transference neurosis.

Neurosis is an illness which is defined as inferior adaptation.

A neurosis or other psychological illness is a wrong psychological attitude.

In the neurotic state the patient is related but only via his neurosis.

When this way of relating is dissolved through analysis the patient becomes more and more isolated and adrift, and so naturally clings more and more to the analyst, where the transference takes the place of a life-belt.

Such a transference is absolutely vital; to out such a transference is fatal.

It can only be out when the patient has a sufficient reality function, that is, sufficient reality in the sense of sufficient relationship elsewhere.

Reasons for the Transference:

The causalistic theory does not explain entirely.

Teleological reasons must be sought.

The sex transference was next investigated.

Sexual transference is particularly strong in those cases where there is a great distance between analyst and analysand, a great lack of understanding.

Such a sexual urge disappears when the distance is reduced to the right amount - i.e. the abnormal sexuality can be dissolved so.
This will explain only urgent sex-transference.

In other types of transference this theory does not hold.

Here the transference aims at acquiring a function or value that the patient does not possess.

This can also be observed in everyday life - in mutual attraction between people who would never be expected to like each other, as a means of acquiring a particular function.

This is usually unconscious. They attract each other in order to form a symbiosis.

Treatment of the Transference.

1. It is most important that the patient should accept the transference. That is, there is need for submission to things as they are. For the image of the object always has the gaps filled with subjective data which are projections. Such acceptance is the beginning of the dissolution of the transference, but the patient will be eternally bound until he submits to things as they are, till then he is still a slave of the unconscious. This act of submission may have to be repeated again and again.

2. The next problem is how to live under these accepted conditions. No formula can be taught, an individual way must be found in order to make life possible under such conditions. No conscious way can be found; we are in a cul-de-sac. The cunning of the unconscious must be enlisted, for it possesses all the wisdom of the ages. By dream analysis we find that in the transference there is an impersonal factor as well as the personal one. This touches the problem of how far our psyche is individual and how far collective. For much of the transference is collective, not individual. Thus any object is able to replace the collective factor in the transference.

The first appearance of the transference is intensely personal, because the individual and collective factors in the patient are not differentiated.

That amount which is found to be individual is the germ of individual relationship, the remnant is collective and can be carried by practically anybody.

In the transference the undeveloped functions and values are projected.

For the unconscious appears First in the object.

For example, if thinking is repressed the power of thinking in others may either repel or attract, for repressed things are despised, often dirty! they are primitive and to be mistrusted; or on the other hand this power may be depreciated in order to protect the ego.

When the patient is still only in love with his projected values he Is living only in his own magic circle and the love is auto-eroticism.

When real love appears the analyst feels the spark, before that he feels nothing.

The typical difference between the extrovert and introvert appears at the next stage; the stage of reaction where the extrovert advances and the introvert withdraws.

The basic phenomena are the same for both types; and in the unconscious the types react in reversed style.

Question re: projection. Does the recipient of a projection necessarily have a hook on which it is hung?

For example, a patient with a morbid love of truth compels the analyst sooner or later to lie; he mistrusts everybody because nobody can come up to his standard.

Thus he becomes isolated and finally comes to the analyst who is "the perfect man."

Answer. When the analyst lies it is either as a compensation for the patient's exaggerated attitude; or because he is undermined by the patient's unconscious.

Then the analyst must look into himself, to see whether he has lied on his own account or for the patient.

So shall the passionate lover of truth come to know that he is no small liar.

The analyst has to come down to the level of the morbid material so as to give a hand to the patient's inferiority.

The analyst must not be a complete individual but must to a great extent mirror the patient, act as his compensatory function.
So at times he must even lie or be insincere.

As example, Jung told the story of how in talking to a very idealistic patient he once declared that Plato was a materialist and did not discover it till he was alone, and then could not imagine what could have made him make such a statement, which however mirrored the repressed aspect of the patient.

Projections are like a sand storm in which you are sitting, and en intuitive person feels the impact whether it is expressed or not.

Transference is composed of projections and is the alpha and omega of analysis; it is a fire between patient and analyst.
The same mechanism takes place in daily life, when you lie towards to all sorts of people.

It is not always something in the analyst which causes the projection; but it is also important that something of the sort happens in the relationship.

For example, the projection of lying.

The analyst may have lying in him as an individual or in his collective role; it may be personal or impersonal.
It is immaterial which it is, what matters is that the analyst should be proof against the lowering influence of such projections.

He must be able to stand such a shock without falling down. He must be able to withstand the inferiority aroused.
If the analyst is upset by a projection he must assume that he was unconscious of the hook.

Question. How can a transference occurring to someone outside of the analysis Erased in the analysis? the problem of the counter-pole.

Answer. A counter-pole is often assumed to prevent getting too much under-En-influence of the analyst; it is due to fear. This relationship is kept dark. But it is really fear of the Self, not of the analyst, fear of being carried away. However, a genuine love object may really exist. Those relationships the analyst must be careful not to upset. For the actual relationships of the patient may be really valuable, furthermore morbid relationships may be successfully analyzed without breaking them and then they too are really valuable.

Where the patient is entirely in the family, the relations have to be completely upset. If a relation is maintained as equal to the relation to I the analyst this has to be cut down. But all the circumstances must be considered, so as not to upset economic and other similar conditions unnecessarily. Relationships must be fostered as far as possible and maintained, and thus a morbid transference can be avoided.

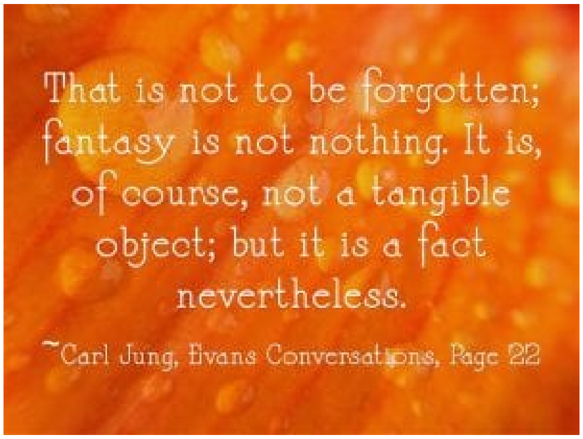
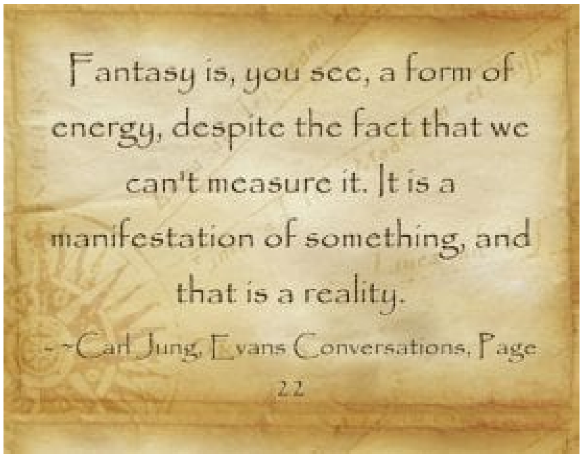
Some Carl Jung Quotations posted June 24, 2017 (2019-06-24 03:40)



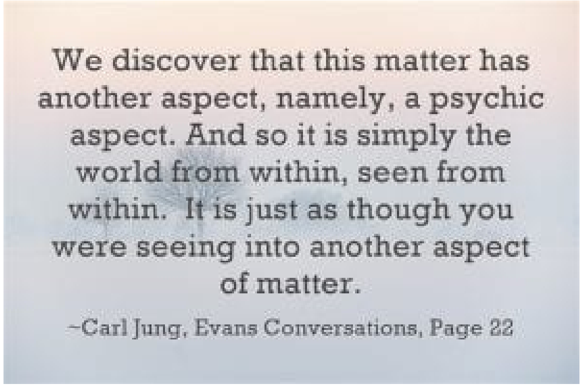
That is not to be forgotten; fantasy is not nothing. It is, of course, not a tangible object; but it is a fact nevertheless.

~Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 22



Fantasy is, you see, a form of energy, despite the fact that we can't measure it. It is a manifestation of something, and that is a reality.

- ~Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 22



We discover that this matter has another aspect, namely, a psychic aspect. And so it is simply the world from within, seen from within. It is just as though you were seeing into another aspect of matter.

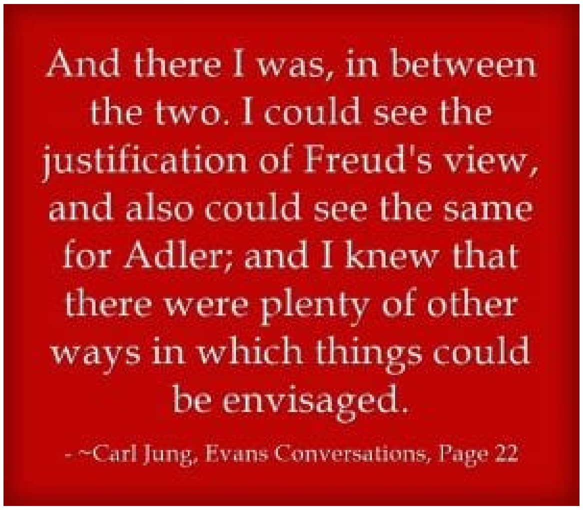
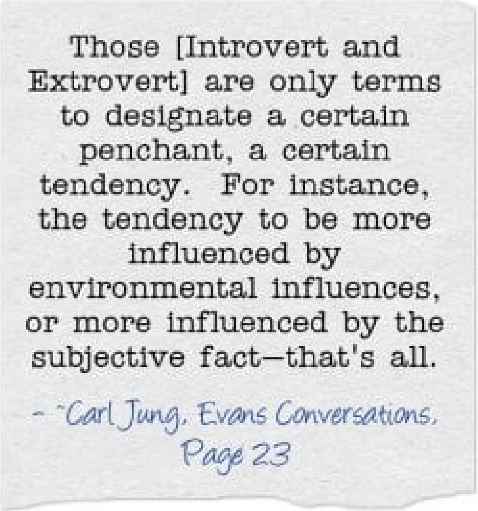
AND THAT'S THE GREAT MISTAKE, BECAUSE MAN IS JUST THAT WHICH HE IS BORN, AND HE IS NOT BORN AS TABULA RASA BUT AS A REALITY.

- CARL JUNG, EVANS CONVERSATIONS, PAGE 22



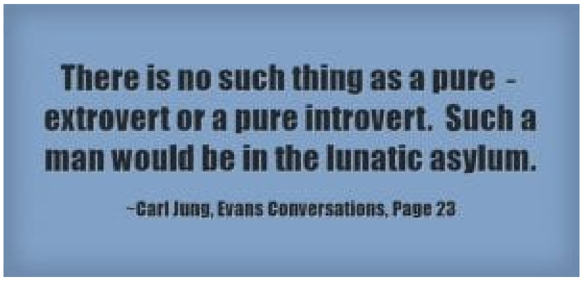
And there I was, in between the two. I could see the justification of Freud's view, and also could see the same for Adler; and I knew that there were plenty of other ways in which things could be envisaged.

- ~Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 22



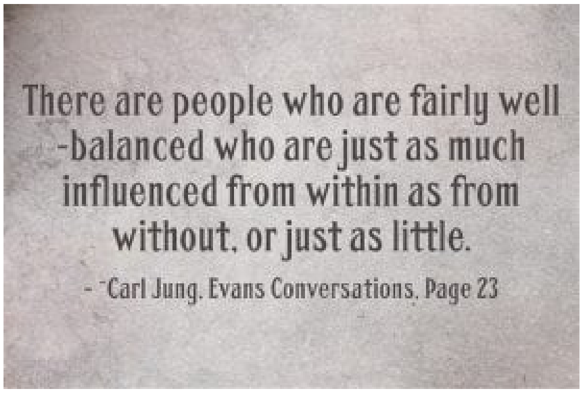
Those [Introvert and Extrovert] are only terms to designate a certain penchant, a certain tendency. For instance, the tendency to be more influenced by environmental influences, or more influenced by the subjective fact—that's all.

- ~Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 23



There is no such thing as a pure -extrovert or a pure introvert. Such a man would be in the lunatic asylum.

~Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 23



There are people who are fairly well -balanced who are just as much influenced from within as from without, or just as little.

And that's the great mistake, because man is just that which he is born, and he is not born as tabula rasa but as a reality. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 22.

And there I was, in between the two. I could see the justification of Freud's view, and also could see the same for Adler; and I knew that there were plenty of other ways in which things could be envisaged. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 22.

Carl Jung Letter on Astrology and Astrologers (2019-06-24 04:01)

On Astrology and Astrologers Letter from Carl Jung to Robert L. Kroon:

Astrology is one of the intuitive methods like the I Ching, geomantics and other divinatory procedures. It is based upn the synchronicity principle, i.e., meaningful coincidence I have explored experimentally three intuitive methods: the method of the I Ching, geomantics and astrology.

Astrology is a naively projected psychology in which the different attitudes and temperaments of man are represented as gods and identified with planets and zodiacal constellations. While studying astrology I have applied it to concrete cases many times.

There are remarkable coincidences, e.g. the position of Mars in the zenith in the famous horoscope of Wilhelm II, the so-called “Friedenkaiser.” This position is said already in a medieval treatise to mean always a causa ab alto, a fall from the height.

The experiment is most suggestive to a versatile mind, unreliable in the hands of the unimaginative, and dangerous in the hands of a fool, as those intuitive methods always are. If intelligently used the experiment is useful in cases where it is a matter of an opaque structure. It often provides surprising insights. The most definite limit of the experiment is a lack of intelligence and literal-mindedness of the observer. It is an intelligent apercu like the shape of the hand or the expression of the face—things of which a stupid and unimaginative mind can make nothing and from which a superstitious mind draws the wrong conclusions.

Astrological “truths” as statistical results are questionable or even unlikely.

The superstitious use [prediction of future or statement of facts beyond psychological possibilities) is false.

Astrology differs very much from alchemy, as its historical literature consists merely of different methods of casting a horoscope and of interpretation, and not of philosophical texts as is the case in alchemy.

There is not psychological exposition of astrology yet, on account of the fact that the empirical foundations in the sense of a science has not yet been laid. The reason for this is that astrology does not follow the principle of causality, but depends, like all intuitive methods, on acausality. Undoubtedly astrology today is flourishing as never before in the past, but it is still most unsatisfactorily explored despite very frequent use. It is an apt tool only when used intelligently. It is not at all fooproof and when used by a rationalistic and narrow mind it is a definite nuisance.

Carl Jung on Life after Death (2019-06-24 04:04)

[1]

Anonymous

Dear Frau N., 30 May 1960

My old age and the need for rest make me fight shy of too many visitors, so I have to confine myself as far as possible to written answers.

I can answer your question about life after death just as well by letter as by word of mouth .

Actually this question exceeds the capacity of the human mind, which cannot assert anything beyond itself.

Furthermore, all scientific statements are merely probable.

So we can only ask: is there a probability of life after death?

The point is that, like all our concepts, time and space are not axiomatic but are statistical truths.

This is proved by the fact that the psyche does not fit entirely into these categories.

It is capable of telepathic and precognitive perceptions.

To that extent it exists in a continuum outside time and space.

We may therefore expect post-mortal phenomena to occur which must be regarded as authentic.

Nothing can be ascertained about existence outside time.

The comparative rarity of such phenomena suggests at all events that the forms of existence inside and outside time are so sharply divided that crossing this boundary presents the greatest difficulties.

But this does not exclude the possibility that there is an existence outside time which runs parallel with existence inside time.

Yes, we ourselves may simultaneously exist in both worlds, and occasionally we do have intimations of a twofold existence.

But what is outside time is, according to our understanding, outside change.

It possesses relative eternity.

Perhaps you know my essay "The Soul and Death ."

For its scientific foundation I would draw your attention to my "Synchronicity: An Acausal Connecting Principle," in Jung and Pauli, The Interpretation of Nature and the Psyche.

These are my essential thoughts, and I would not express them otherwise in a talk with you.

Yours sincerely,

C.G. Jung Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 561.

Carl Jung on Mithraic and Christian Totemism (2019-06-24 04:29)

[1]

Of the archaic symbols which may arise to take the place of the missing impersonal attitude, Totemic ideas are perhaps the most frequent and the most important.

1. Mithraic totemism, which produces a re-identification with the Bull of Mithras; this will manifest itself in bull-like shouting.

2. Christian totemism. This gives identification with the Little Lamb, when one becomes very meek, and adopts a martyr-like attitude. This is archaic; it is indecent, something to be ashamed of. When one has lived through these things, then, as an individual, to go back to it is dirty, obscene. When one is far from it one can look back at it and be interested scientifically in it. But if you get such a regression with archaic symbols, you will get a recrudescence of symptoms, because you are going back to the original slime. This happens when you are too intellectual in the conscious.

When we get a step beyond Ecclesiastical Christianity, we are in a position where our formulated impersonal attitude is defective. We are in a new situation and there is a lack of new attitude in the conscious, and already an old collective attitude has been constellated in the unconscious. (If a very personal problem becomes unconscious, it is probably because it was molded on an archetype which has sucked it down.)

The impersonal attitude is linked up with the pure manifestation of the basic principles: the masculine logos, and the feminine ores. When you are capable of a pure manifestation of a pure Logos or Eros, you will have a pure impersonal attitude. Christ was incarnate Logos or order, end also incarnate Eros or Love of God. The mystic movement of the worship of the Sacred Heart came up re Christ and also are the worship of the Virgin, sword piercing her heart, but later development transferred the heart into Christ. Christ contains all projections. Men projected head and called him the Logos, and women projected heart and called him Love. An unconditioned attitude demands sacrifice; so that sacrifice Is correlated to such an unconditioned attitude. But beware of equating it to the Christian idea of self-denial end so forth, which to many people is easy, while the opposite is the real sacrifice, and is equivalent to the unconditioned attitude. Carl Jung and Sigmund Freud (2019-06-24 04:37)

Sigmund Freud

I embarked on the adventure of my intellectual development by becoming a psychiatrist In all innocence I began observing mental patients, clinically, from the outside, and thereby came upon psychic processes of a striking nature.

I noted and classified these things without the slightest understanding of their contents, which were considered to be adequately evaluated when they were dismissed as "pathological."

In the course of time my interest focused more and more upon cases in which I experienced something understandable that is, cases of paranoia, manic-depressive insanity, and psychogenic disturbances.

From the start of my psychiatric career the studies of Breuer and Freud, along with tie work of Pierre Janet, provided me with a wealth of suggestions and stimuli.

Above all, I found that Freud’s technique of dream analysis and dream interpretation cast a valuable light upon schizophrenic forms of expression.

As early as 1900 1 had read Freud’s The Interpretation of Dreams.

1 had laid the book aside, at the time, because I did not yet grasp it.

At the age of twenty-five I lacked the experience to appreciate Freud’s theories.

Such experience did not come until later.

In 1903 1 once more took up The Interpretation of Dreams and discovered how it all linked up with my own ideas.

What chiefly interested me was the application to dreams of the concept of the repression mechanism, which was derived from the psychology of the neuroses.

This was important to me because I had frequently encountered repressions in my experiments with word association; in response to certain stimulus words the patient either had no associative answer or was unduly slow in his reaction time.

As was later discovered, such a disturbance occurred each time the stimulus word had touched upon a psychic lesion or conflict.

In most cases the patient was unconscious of this.

When questioned about the cause of the disturbance, he would often answer in a peculiarly artificial manner.

My reading of Freud's The Interpretation of Dreams showed me that the repression mechanism was at work here, and that the facts I had observed were consonant with his theory.

Thus I was able to corroborate Freud's line of argument.

The situation was different when it came to the content of the repression.

Here I could not agree with Freud.

He considered the cause of the repression to be a sexual trauma.

From my practice, however, I was familiar with numerous cases of neurosis in which the question of sexuality played a subordinate part, other factors standing in the foreground for example, the problem of social adaptation, of oppression by tragic circumstances of life, prestige considerations, and so on.

Later I presented such cases to Freud; but he would not grant that factors other than sexuality could be the cause.

That was highly unsatisfactory to me.

At the beginning it was not easy for me to assign Freud the proper place in my life, or to take the right attitude toward him.

When I became acquainted with his work I was planning an academic career, and was about to complete a paper that was intended to advance me at the university.

But Freud was definitely persona non grata in the academic world at the time, and any connection with him would have been damaging in scientific circles.

"Important people" at most mentioned him surreptitiously, and at congresses he was discussed only in the corridors, never on the floor.

Therefore the discovery that my association experiments were in agreement with Freud’s theories was far from pleasant to me.

Once, while I was in my laboratory and reflecting again upon these questions, the devil whispered to me that I would be justified in publishing the results of my experiments and my conclusions without mentioning Freud.

After all, I had worked out my experiments long before I understood his work.

But then I heard the voice of my second personality: "If you do a thing like that, as if you had no knowledge of Freud, it would be a piece of trickery. You cannot build your life upon a lie."

With that, the question was settled.

From then on I became an open partisan of Freud’s and fought for him.

I first took up the cudgels for Freud at a congress in Munich where a lecturer discussed obsessional neuroses but studiously forbore to mention the name of Freud.

In 1906, in connection with this incident, I wrote a paper for the Munchner Medizinische Wochenschrift on Freud’s theory of the neuroses, which had contributed a great deal to the understanding of obsessional neuroses.

In response to this article, two German professors wrote to me, warning that if I remained on Freud’s side and continued to defend him, I would be endangering my academic career.

I replied: “If what Freud says is the truth, I am with him. I don’t give a damn for a career if it has to be based on the premise of restricting research and concealing the truth."

And I went on defending Freud and his ideas.

But on the basis of my own findings I was still unable to feel that all neuroses were caused by sexual repression or sexual traumata.

In certain cases that was so, but not in others.

Nevertheless, Freud had opened up a new path of investigation, and the shocked outcries against him at the time seemed to me absurd.

I had not met with much sympathy for the ideas expressed in "The Psychology of Dementia Praecox."

In fact, my colleagues laughed at me.

But through this book I came to know Freud.

He invited me to visit him, and our first meeting took place in Vienna in March 1907.

We met at one o’clock in the afternoon and talked virtually without a pause for thirteen hours.

Freud was the first man of real importance I had encountered; in my experience up to that time, no one else could compare with him.

There was nothing the least trivial in his attitude.

I found him extremely intelligent, shrewd, and altogether remarkable.

And yet my first impressions of him remained somewhat tangled; I could not make him out.

What he said about his sexual theory impressed me.

Nevertheless, his words could not remove my hesitations and doubts.

I tried to advance these reservations of mine on several occasions, but each time he would attribute them to my lack of experience.

Freud was right; in those days I had not enough experience to support my objections.

I could see that his sexual theory was enormously important to him, both personally and philosophically.

This impressed me, but I could not decide to what extent this strong emphasis upon sexuality was connected with subjective prejudices of his, and to what extent it rested upon verifiable experiences.

Above all, Freud’s attitude toward the spirit seemed to me highly questionable.

Wherever, in a person or in a work of art, an expression of spirituality (in the intellectual, not the supernatural sense) came to light, he suspected it, and insinuated that it was repressed sexuality.

Anything that could not be directly interpreted as sexuality he referred to as "psychosexuality."

I protested that this hypothesis, carried to its logical conclusion, would lead to an annihilating judgment upon culture.

Culture would then appear as a mere farce, the morbid consequence of repressed sexuality.

"Yes," he assented, "so it is, and that is just a curse of fate against which we are powerless to contend."

I was by no means disposed to agree, or to let it go at that, but still I did not feel competent to argue it out with him.

There was something else that seemed to me significant at that first meeting.

It had to do with things which I was able to think out and understand only after our friendship was over.

There was no mistaking the fact that Freud was emotionally involved in his sexual theory to an extraordinary degree.

When he spoke of it, his tone became urgent, almost anxious, and all signs of his normally critical and skeptical manner vanished.

A strange, deeply moved expression came over his face, the cause of which I was at a loss to understand.

I had a strong intuition that for him sexuality was a sort of numinosum.

This was confirmed by a conversation which took place some three years later (in 1910), again in Vienna.

I can still recall vividly how Freud said to me, "My dear Jung, promise me never to abandon the sexual theory. That is the most essential thing of all. You see, we must make a dogma of it, an unshakable bulwark."

He said that to me with great emotion, in the tone of a father saying, "And promise me this one thing, my dear son: that you will go to church every Sunday.”

In some astonishment I asked him, "A bulwark against what?"

To which he replied, "Against the black tide of mud" and here he hesitated for a moment, then added "of occultism."

First of all, it was the words "bulwark" and "dogma” that alarmed me; for a dogma, that is to say, an undisputable confession of faith, is set up only when the aim is to suppress doubts once and for all.

But that no longer has anything to do with scientific judgment; only with a personal power drive.

This was the thing that struck at the heart of our friendship.

I knew that I would never be able to accept such an attitude*

What Freud seemed to mean by “occultism” was virtually everything that philosophy and religion, including the rising contemporary science of parapsychology, had learned about the psyche.

To me the sexual theory was just as occult, that is to say, just as unproven an hypothesis, as many other speculative views.

As I saw it, a scientific truth was a hypothesis which might be adequate for the moment but was not to be preserved as an article of faith for all time.

Although I did not properly understand it then, I had observed in Freud the eruption of unconscious religious factors.

Evidently he wanted my aid in erecting a barrier against these threatening unconscious contents.

The impression this conversation made upon me added to my confusion; until then I had not considered sexuality as a precious and imperiled concept to which one must remain faithful.

Sexuality evidently meant more to Freud than to other people.

For him it was something to be religiously observed. In the face of such deep convictions one generally becomes shy and reticent.

After a few stammering attempts on my part, the conversation soon came to an end.

I was bewildered and embarrassed.

I had the feeling that I had caught a glimpse of a new, unknown country from which swarms of new ideas flew to meet me.

One thing was clear: Freud, who had always made much of his irreligiosity, had now constructed a dogma; or rather, in the place of a jealous God whom he had lost, he had substituted another compelling image, that of sexuality.

It was no less insistent, exacting, domineering, threatening, and morally ambivalent than the original one.

Just as the psychically stronger agency is given "divine" or "daemonic" attributes, so the "sexual libido" took over the role of a deus absconditus, a hidden or concealed god.

The advantage of this transformation for Freud was, apparently, that he was able to regard the new numinous principle as scientifically irreproachable and free from all religious taint.

At bottom, however, the numinosity, that is, the psychological qualities of the two rationally incommensurable opposites Yahweh and sexuality remained the same.

The name alone had changed, and with it, of course, the point of view: the lost god had now to be sought below, not above.

But what difference does it make, ultimately, to the stronger agency if it is called now by one name and now by another?

If psychology did not exist, but only concrete objects, the one would actually have been destroyed and replaced by the other.

But in reality, that is to say, in psychological experience, there is not one whit the less of urgency, anxiety, compulsiveness, etc.

The problem still remains: how to overcome or escape our anxiety, bad conscience, guilt, compulsion, unconsciousness, and instinctuality.

If we cannot do this from the bright, idealistic side, then perhaps we shall have better luck by approaching the problem from the dark, biological side.

Like flames suddenly flaring up, these thoughts darted through my mind.

Much later, when I reflected upon Freud's character, they revealed their significance.

There was one characteristic of his that preoccupied me above all: his bitterness.

It had struck me at our first encounter, but it remained inexplicable to me until I was able to see it in connection with his attitude toward sexuality.

Although, for Freud, sexuality was undoubtedly a numinosum, his terminology and theory seemed to define it exclusively as a biological function.

It was only the emotionality with which he spoke of it that revealed the deeper elements reverberating within him.

Basically, he wanted to teach or so at least it seemed to me that, regarded from within, sexuality included spirituality and had an intrinsic meaning.

But his concretistic terminology was too narrow to express this idea.

He gave me the impression that at bottom he was working against his own goal and against himself; and there is, after all, no harsher bitterness than that of a person who is his own worst enemy.

In his own words, he felt himself menaced by a "black tide of mud" he who more than anyone else had tried to let down his buckets into those black depths.

Freud never asked himself why he was compelled to talk continually of sex, why this idea had taken such possession of him.

He remained unaware that his ”monotony of interpretation" expressed a flight from himself, or from that other side of him which might perhaps be called mystical

So long as he refused to acknowledge that side, he could never be reconciled with himself.

He was blind toward the paradox and ambiguity of the contents of the unconscious, and did not know that everything which arises out of the unconscious has a top and a bottom, an inside and an outside.

When we speak of the outside and that is what Freud did we are considering only half of the whole, with the result that a countereffect arises out of the unconscious.

There was nothing to be done about this one-sidedness of Freud’s.

Perhaps some inner experience of his own might have opened his eyes; but then his intellect would have reduced any such experience to "mere sexuality" or "psychosexuality."

He remained the victim of the one aspect he could recognize, and for that reason I see him as a tragic figure; for he was a great man, and what is more, a man in the grip of his daimon.

After that second conversation in Vienna I also understood Alfred Adler’s power hypothesis, to which I had hitherto paid scant attention.

Like many sons, Adler had learned from his "father" not what the father said, but what he did.

Instantly, the problem of love (Eros) and power came down upon me like a leaden weight.

Freud himself had told me that he had never read Nietzsche; now I saw Freud’s psychology as, so to speak, an adroit move on the part of intellectual history, compensating for Nietzsche’s deification of the power principle.

The problem had obviously to be rephrased not as "Freud versus Adler" but "Freud versus Nietzsche."

It was therefore, I thought, more than a domestic quarrel in the domain of psychopathology.

The idea dawned on me that Eros and the power drive might be in a sense like the dissident sons of a single father, or the products of a single motivating psychic force which manifested itself empirically in opposing forms, like positive and negative electrical charges, Eros as a patiens, the power drive as an agens, and vice versa.

Eros makes just as great demands upon the power drive as the latter upon the former.

Where is the one drive without the other?

On the one hand man succumbs to the drive; on the other hand, he tries to master it.

Freud shows how the object succumbs to the drive, and Adler how man uses the drive in order to force his will upon the object.

Nietzsche, helpless in the hands of his destiny, had to create a "superman" for himself. Freud, I concluded, must himself be so profoundly affected by the power of Eros that he actually wished to elevate it into a dogma aere perennius like a religious numen.

It is no secret that “Zarathustra" is the proclaimer of a gospel, and here was Freud also trying to outdo the church and to canonize a theory.

To be sure, he did not do this too loudly; instead, he suspected me of wanting to be a prophet.

He made his tragic claim and demolished it at the same time.

That is how people usually behave with numinosities, and rightly so, for in one respect they are true, in another untrue.

Numinous experience elevates and humiliates simultaneously.

If Freud had given somewhat more consideration to the psychological truth that sexuality is numinous both a god and a devil he would not have remained bound within the confines of a biological concept.

And Nietzsche might not have been carried over the brink of the world by his intellectual excesses if he had only held more firmly to the foundations of human existence.

Wherever the psyche is set violently oscillating by a numinous experience, there is a danger that the thread by which one hangs may be torn.

Should that happen, one man tumbles into an absolute affirmation, another into an equally absolute negation, Nirdvandva (freedom from opposites) is the Orient's remedy for this.

I have not forgotten that.

The pendulum of the mind oscillates between sense and nonsense, not between right and wrong.

The numinosum is dangerous because it lures men to extremes, so that a modest truth is regarded as the truth and a minor mistake is equated with fatal error.

Tout passe yesterday's truth is today's deception, and yesterday's false inference may be tomorrow's revelation.

This is particularly so in psychological matters, of which, if truth were told, we still know very little.

We are still a long way from understanding what it signifies that nothing has any existence unless some small and h, so transitory consciousness has become aware of it.

My conversation with Freud had shown me that he feared that the numinous light of his sexual insights might be extinguished by a '"black tide of mud.

Thus a mythological situation had arisen: the struggle between light and darkness.

That explains its numinosity, and why Freud immediately fell back on his dogma as a religious means of defense/In my next book, Wandlungen und Symbole der Libido, which dealt with the hero's struggle for freedom, Freud's curious reaction prompted me to investigate further this archetypal theme and its mythological background.

What with the sexual interpretation on the one hand and the power drive of dogma on the other I was led, over the years, to a consideration of the problem of typology.

It was necessary to study the polarity and dynamics of the psyche.

And I also embarked upon an investigation extending over several decades of "the black tide of mud of occultism" that is to say, I tried to understand the conscious and unconscious historical assumptions underlying our contemporary psychology.

It interested me to hear Freud's views on precognition and on parapsychology in general.

When I visited him in Vienna in 1909 I asked him what he thought of these matters.

Because of his materialistic prejudice, he rejected this entire complex of questions as nonsensical, and did so in terms of so shallow a positivism that I had difficulty in checking the sharp retort on the tip of my tongue.

It was some years before he recognized the seriousness of parapsychology and acknowledged the factuality of "occult" phenomena.

While Freud was going on this way, I had a curious sensation.

It was as if my diaphragm were made of iron and were becoming red-hot a glowing vault.

And at that moment there was such a loud report in the bookcase, which stood right next to us, that we both started up in alarm, fearing the thing was going to topple over on us.

I said to Freud: "There, that is an example of a so-called catalytic exteriorization phenomenon."

"Oh come," he exclaimed. "That is sheer bosh."

"It is not," I replied. "You are mistaken, Herr Professor.

And to prove my point I now predict that in a moment there will be another such loud report!"

Sure enough, no sooner had I said the words than the same detonation went off in the bookcase.

To this day I do not know what gave me this certainty.

But I knew beyond all doubt that the report would come again.

Freud only stared aghast at me.

I do not know what was in his mind, or what his look meant.

In any case, this incident aroused his mistrust of me, and I had the feeling that I had done something against him, I never afterward discussed the incident with him.

The year 1909 proved decisive for our relationship.

I had been invited to lecture on the association experiment at Clark University in Worcester, Massachusetts.

Independently, Freud had also received an invitation, and we decided to travel together.

We met in Bremen, where Ferenczi joined us.

In Bremen the much-discussed incident of Freud's fainting fit occurred.

It was provoked indirectly by my interest in the "peat-bog corpses."

I knew that in certain districts of Northern Germany these so-called bog corpses were to be found.

They are the bodies of prehistoric men who either drowned in the marshes or were buried there.

The bog water in which the bodies lie contains humic acid, which consumes the bones and simultaneously tans the skin, so that it and the hair are perfectly preserved.

In essence this is a process of natural mummification, in the course of which the bodies are pressed flat by the weight of the peat.

Such remains are occasionally turned up by peat diggers in Holstein, Denmark, and Sweden.

Having read about these peat-bog corpses, I recalled them when we were in Bremen, but, being a bit muddled, confused them with the mummies in the lead cellars of the city.

This interest of mine got on Freud's nerves.

"Why are you so concerned with these corpses?" he asked me several times.

He was inordinately vexed by the whole thing and during one such conversation, while we were having dinner together, he suddenly fainted.

Afterward he said to me that he was convinced that all this chatter about corpses meant I had death-wishes toward him.

I was more than surprised by this interpretation.

I was alarmed by the intensity of his fantasies so strong that, obviously, they could cause him to faint.

In a similar connection Freud once more suffered a fainting fit in my presence.

This was during the Psychoanalytic Congress in Munich in 1912.

Someone had turned the conversation to Amenophis IV (Ikhnaton).

The point was made that as a result of his negative attitude toward his father he had destroyed his father's cartouches on the steles, and that at the back of his great creation of a monotheistic religion there lurked a father complex.

This sort of thing irritated me, and I attempted to argue that Amenophis had been a creative and profoundly religious person whose acts could not be explained by personal resistances toward his father.

On the contrary, I said, he had held the memory of his father in honor, and his zeal for destruction had been directed only against the name of the god Amon, which he had everywhere annihilated; it was also chiseled out of the cartouches of his father Amon-hotep.

Moreover, other pharaohs had replaced the names of their actual or divine forefathers on monuments and statues by their own, feeling that they had a right to do so since they were incarnations of the same god.

Yet they, I pointed out, had inaugurated neither a new style nor a new religion.

At that moment Freud slid off his chair in a faint.

Everyone clustered helplessly around him.

I picked him up, carried him into the next room, and laid him on a sofa.

As I was carrying him, he half came to, and I shall never forget the look he cast at me.

In his weakness he looked at me as if I were his father.

Whatever other causes may have contributed to this faint the atmosphere was very tense the fantasy of father-murder was common to both cases.

At the time Freud frequently made allusions indicating that he regarded me as his successor.

These hints were embarrassing to me, for I knew that I would never be able to uphold his views properly, that is to say, as he intended them.

On the other hand I had not yet succeeded in working out my criticisms in such a manner that they would carry any weight with him, and my respect for him was too great for me to want to force him to come finally to grips with my own ideas.

I was by no means charmed by the thought of being burdened, virtually over my own head, with the leadership of a party.

In the first place that sort of thing was not in my nature; in the second place I could not sacrifice my intellectual independence; and in the third place such luster was highly unwelcome to me since it would only deflect me from my real aims.

I was concerned with investigating truth, not with questions of personal prestige.

The trip to the United States which began in Bremen in 1909 lasted for seven weeks.

We were together every day, and analyzed each other's dreams.

At the time I had a number of important ones, but Freud could make nothing of them.

I did not regard that as any reflection upon him, for it sometimes happens to the best analyst that he is unable to unlock the riddle of a dream.

It was a human failure, and I would never have wanted to discontinue our dream analyses on that account.

On the contrary, they meant a great deal to me, and I found our relationship exceedingly valuable.

I regarded Freud as an older, more mature and experienced personality, and felt like a son in that respect.

But then something happened which proved to be a severe blow to the whole relationship.

Freud had a dream I would not think it right to air the problem it involved.

I interpreted it as best I could, but added that a great deal more could be said about it if he would supply me with some additional details from his private life, Freud’s response to these words was a curious look a look of the utmost suspicion.

Then he said, "But I cannot risk my authority!"

At that moment he lost it altogether.

That sentence burned itself into my memory; and in it the end of our relationship was already foreshadowed, Freud was placing personal authority above truth.

As I have already said, Freud was able to interpret the dreams I was then having only incompletely or not at all.

They were dreams with collective contents, containing a great deal of symbolic material.

One in particular was important to me, for it led me for the first time to the concept of the "collective unconscious" and thus formed a kind of prelude to my book, Wandlungen und Symbole der Libido.

This was the dream. I was in a house I did not know, which had two stories. It was "my house."

I found myself in the upper story, where there was a kind of salon furnished with fine old pieces in rococo style.

On the walls hung a number of precious old paintings.

I wondered that this should be my house, and thought, "Not bad."

But then it occurred to me that I did not know what the lower floor looked like.

Descending the stairs, I reached the ground floor.

There everything was much older, and I realized that this part of the house must date from about the fifteenth or sixteenth century.

The furnishings were medieval; the floors were of red brick.

Everywhere it was rather dark.

I went from one room to another, dunking, "Now I really must explore the whole house."

I came upon a heavy door, and opened it.

Beyond it, I discovered a stone stairway that led down into the cellar.

Descending again, I found myself in a beautifully vaulted room which looked exceedingly ancient.

Examining die walls, I discovered layers of brick among the ordinary stone blocks, and chips of brick in the mortar.

As soon as I saw this I knew that the walls dated from Roman times.

My interest by now was intense.

I looked more closely at the floor.

It was of stone slabs, and in one of these I discovered a ring.

When I pulled it, the stone slab lifted, and again I saw a stairway of narrow stone steps leading down into the depths.

These, too, I descended, and entered a low cave cut into the rock.

Thick dust lay on the floor, and in the dust were scattered bones and broken pottery, like remains of a primitive culture.

I discovered two human skulls, obviously very old and half disintegrated.

Then I awoke.

What chiefly interested Freud in this dream were the two skulls.

He returned to them repeatedly, and urged me to find a wish in connection with them.

What did I think about these skulls? And whose were they?

I knew perfectly well, of course, what he was driving at: that secret death-wishes were concealed in the dream.

"But what does he really expect of me?" I thought to myself. Toward whom would I have death-wishes?

I felt violent resistance to any such interpretation.

I also had some intimation of what the dream might really mean.

But I did not then trust my own judgment, and wanted to hear Freud's opinion.

I wanted to learn from him.

Therefore I submitted to his intention and said, "My wife and my sister-in-law" after all, I had to name someone whose death was worth the wishing!

I was newly married at the time and knew perfectly well that there was nothing within myself which pointed to such wishes.

But I would not have been able to present to Freud my own ideas on an interpretation of the dream without encountering incomprehension and vehement resistance.

I did not feel up to quarreling with him, and I also feared that I might lose his friendship if I insisted on my own point of view.

On the other hand, I wanted to know what he would make of my answer, and what his reaction would be if I deceived him by saying something that suited his theories.

And so I told him a lie.

I was quite aware that my conduct was not above reproach, but la guerre, comme a la guerre!

It would have been impossible for me to afford him any insight into my mental world.

The gulf between it and his was too great.

In fact Freud seemed greatly relieved by my reply.

I saw from this that he was completely helpless in dealing with certain kinds of dreams and had to take refuge in his doctrine.

I realized that it was up to me to find out the real meaning of the dream.

It was plain to me that the house represented a kind of image of the psyche that is to say, of my then state of consciousness, with hitherto unconscious additions.

Consciousness was represented by the salon.

It had an inhabited atmosphere, in spite of its antiquated style.

The ground floor stood for the first level of the unconscious.

The deeper I went, the more alien and the darker the scene became.

In the cave, I discovered remains of a primitive culture, that is, the world of the primitive man within myself a world which can scarcely be reached or illuminated by consciousness.

The primitive psyche of man borders on the life of the animal soul, just as the caves of prehistoric times were usually inhabited by animals before men laid claim to them.

During this period I became aware of how keenly I felt the difference between Freud's intellectual attitude and mine, I had grown up in the intensely historical atmosphere of Basel at the end of the nineteenth century, and had acquired, thanks to reading the old philosophers, some knowledge of the history of psychology.

When I thought about dreams and the contents of the unconscious, I never did so without making historical comparisons; in my student days I always used Krug's old dictionary of philosophy.

I was especially familiar with the writers of the eighteenth and early nineteenth century.

Theirs was the world which had formed the atmosphere of my first-story salon.

By contrast, I had the impression that Freud's intellectual history began with Buchner, Moleschott, Du Bois-Reymond, and Darwin.

The dream pointed out that there were further reaches to the state of consciousness I have just described: the long uninhabited ground floor in medieval style, then the Roman cellar, and finally the prehistoric cave.

These signified past times and passed stages of consciousness.

Certain questions had been much on my mind during the days preceding this dream.

They were: On what premises is Freudian psychology founded? To what category of human thought does it belong? What is the relationship of its almost exclusive personalism to general historical assumptions?

My dream was giving me the answer.

It obviously pointed to the foundations of cultural history a history of successive layers of consciousness.

My dream thus constituted a kind of structural diagram of the human psyche; it postulated something of an altogether impersonal nature underlying that psyche.

It "clicked," as the English have it and the dream became for me a guiding image which in the days to come was to be corroborated to an extent I could not at first suspect.

It was my first inkling of a collective a priori beneath the personal psyche.

This I first took to be the traces of earlier modes of functioning.

Later, with increasing experience and on the basis of more reliable knowledge, I recognized them as forms of instinct, that is, as archetypes.

I was never able to agree with Freud that the dream is a "facade" behind which its meaning lies hidden a meaning already known but maliciously, so to speak, withheld from consciousness.

To me dreams are a part of nature, which harbors no intention to deceive, but expresses something as best it can, just as a plant grows or an animal seeks its food as best it can.

These forms of life, too, have no wish to deceive our eyes, but we may deceive ourselves because our eyes are shortsighted.

Or we hear amiss because our ears are rather deaf but it is not our ears that wish to deceive us.

Long before I met Freud I regarded the unconscious, and dreams, which are its direct exponents, as natural processes to which no arbitrariness can be attributed, and above all no legerdemain.

I knew no reasons for the assumption that the tricks of consciousness can be extended to the natural processes of the unconscious.

On the contrary, daily experience taught me what intense resistance the unconscious opposes to the tendencies of the conscious mind.

The dream of the house had a curious effect upon me: it revived my old interest in archaeology.

After I had returned to Zurich I took up a book on Babylonian excavations, and read various works on myths.

In the course of this reading I came across Friedrich Creuzer’s Symbolik und Mythologie der alten Volker and that fired me!

I read like mad, and worked with feverish interest through a mountain of mythological material, then through the Gnostic writers, and ended in total confusion.

I found myself in a state of perplexity similar to the one I had experienced at the clinic when I tried to understand the meaning of psychotic states of mind.

It was as if I were in an imaginary madhouse and were beginning to treat and analyze all the centaurs, nymphs, gods, and goddesses in Creuzer's book as though they were my patients.

While thus occupied I could not help but discover the close relationship between ancient mythology and the psychology of primitives, and this led me to an intensive study of the latter.

In the midst of these studies I came upon the fantasies of a young American altogether unknown to me, Miss Miller.

The material had been published by my revered and fatherly friend, Theodore Flournoy, in the Archives de Psychologie (Geneva).

I was immediately struck by the mythological character of the fantasies.

They operated like a catalyst upon the stored-up and still disorderly ideas within me.

Gradually, there formed out of them, and out of the knowledge of myths I had acquired, my book Wandlungen und Symbole der Libido.

While I was working on this book, I had dreams which presaged the forthcoming break with Freud.

One of the most significant had its scene in a mountainous region on the Swiss-Austrian border.

It was toward evening, and I saw an elderly man in the uniform of an Imperial Austrian customs official.

He walked past, somewhat stooped, without paying any attention to me.

His expression was peevish, rather melancholic and vexed.

There were other persons present, and someone informed me that the old man was not really there, but was the ghost of a customs official who had died years ago.

"He is one of those who still couldn’t die properly."

That was the first part of the dream.

I set about analyzing this dream.

In connection with "customs" I at once thought of the word "censorship."

In connection with "border" I thought of the border between consciousness and the unconscious on the one hand, and between Freud’s views and mine on the other.

The extremely rigorous customs examination at the border seemed to me an allusion to analysis.

At a border suitcases are opened and examined for contraband.

In the course of this examination, unconscious assumptions are discovered.

As for the old customs official, his work had obviously brought him so little that was pleasurable and satisfactory that he took a sour view of the world.

I could not refuse to see the analogy with Freud.

At that time Freud had lost much of his authority for me.

But he still meant to me a superior personality, upon whom I projected the father, and at the time of the dream this projection was still far from eliminated.

Where such a projection occurs, we are no longer objective; we persist in a state of divided judgment.

On the one hand we are dependent, and on the other we have resistances.

When the dream took place I still thought highly of Freud, but at the same time I was critical of him.

This divided attitude is a sign that I was still unconscious of the situation and had not come to any resolution of it.

This is characteristic of all projections.

The dream urged upon me the necessity of clarifying this situation.

Under the impress of Freud's personality I had, as far as possible, cast aside my own judgments and repressed my criticisms.

That was the prerequisite for collaborating with him. I had told myself, "Freud is far wiser and more experienced than you.

For the present you must simply listen to what he says and learn from him."

And then, to my own surprise, I found myself dreaming of him as a peevish official of the Imperial Austrian monarchy, as a defunct and still walking ghost of a customs inspector.

Could that be the death-wish which Freud had insinuated I felt toward him?

I could find no part of myself that normally might have had such a wish, for I wanted at all costs to be able to work with Freud, and, in a frankly egotistic manner, to partake of his wealth of experience.

His friendship meant a great deal to me.

I had no reason for wishing him dead.

But it was possible that the dream could be regarded as a corrective, as a compensation or antidote for my conscious high opinion and admiration.

Therefore the dream recommended a rather more critical attitude toward Freud.

I was distinctly shocked by it, although the final sentence of the dream seemed to me an allusion to Freud’s potential immortality.

The dream had not reached its end with the episode of the customs official; after a hiatus came a second and far more remarkable part.

I was in an Italian city, and it was around noon, between twelve and one o’clock.

A fierce sun was beating down upon the narrow streets.

The city was built on hills and reminded me of a particular part of Basel, the Kohlenberg.

The little streets which lead down into the valley, the Birsigtal, that runs through the city, are partly flights of steps. In the dream, one such stairway descended to Barfiisserplatz.

The city was Basel, and yet it was also an Italian city, something like Bergamo.

It was summertime; the blazing sun stood at the zenith, and everything was bathed in an intense light.

A crowd came streaming toward me, and I knew that the shops were closing and people were on their way home to dinner.

In the midst of this stream of people walked a knight in full armor.

He mounted the steps toward me.

He wore a helmet of the kind that is called a basinet, with eye slits, and chain armor.

Over this was a white tunic into which was woven, front and back, a large red cross.

One can easily imagine how I felt: suddenly to see in a modern city, during the noonday rush hour, a crusader coming toward 1.

What struck me as particularly odd was that none of the many persons walking about seemed to notice him.

No one turned his head or gazed after him.

It was as though he were completely invisible to everyone but me.

I asked myself what this apparition meant, and then it was as if someone answered me but there was no one there to speak: "Yes, this is a regular apparition.

The knight always passes by here between twelve and one o'clock, and has been doing so for a very long time [for centuries, I gathered] and everyone knows about it."

The knight and the customs official were contrasting figures.

The customs official was shadowy, someone who "still couldn't die properly" a fading apparition.

The knight, on the other hand, was full of life and completely real.

The second part of the dream was numinous in the extreme, whereas the scene on the border had been prosaic and in itself not impressive; I had been struck only by my reflections upon it.

In the period following these dreams I did a great deal of thinking about the mysterious figure of the knight.

But it was only much later, after I had been meditating on the dream for a long time, that I was able to get some idea of its meaning.

Even in the dream, I knew that the knight belonged to the twelfth century.

That was the period when alchemy was beginning and also the quest for the Holy Grail.

The stories of the Grail had been of the greatest importance to me ever since I read them, at the age of fifteen, for the first time.

I had an inkling that a great secret still lay hidden behind those stories.

Therefore it seemed quite natural to me that the dream should conjure up the world of the Knights of the Grail and their quest for that was, in the deepest sense, my own world, which had scarcely anything to do with Freud's.

My whole being was seeking for something still unknown which might confer meaning upon the banality of life.

To me it was a profound disappointment that all the efforts of the probing mind had apparently succeeded in finding nothing more in the depths of the psyche than the all too familiar and "all-too-human" limitations.

I had grown up in the country, among peasants, and what I was unable to learn in the stables I found out from the Rabelaisian wit and the untrammeled fantasies of our peasant folklore.

Incest and perversions were no remarkable novelties to me, and did not call for any special explanation.

Along with criminality, they formed part of the black lees that spoiled the taste of life by showing me only too plainly the ugliness and meaninglessness of human existence.

That cabbages thrive in dung was something I had always taken for granted.

In all honesty I could discover no helpful insight in such knowledge.

"It’s just that all of those people are city folks who know nothing about nature and the human stable," I thought, sick and tired of these ugly matters.

People who know nothing about nature are of course neurotic, for they are not adapted to reality.

They are too naive, like children, and it is necessary to tell them the facts of life, so to speak to make it plain to diem that they are human beings like all others.

Not that such enlightenment will cure neurotics; they can only regain their health when they climb up out of the mud of the commonplace.

But they are only too fond of lingering in what they have earlier repressed.

How are they ever to emerge if analysis does not make them aware of something different and better, when even theory holds them fast in it and offers them nothing more than the rational or "reasonable" injunction to abandon such childishness?

That is precisely what they cannot do, and how should they be able to if they do not discover something to stand on?

One form of life cannot simply be abandoned unless it is exchanged for another.

As for a totally rational approach to life, that is, as experience shows, impossible, especially when a person is by nature as unreasonable as a neurotic.

I now realized why Freud’s personal psychology was of such burning interest to me.

I was eager to know the truth about his "reasonable solution," and I was prepared to sacrifice a good deal in order to obtain the answer.

Now I felt that I was on the track of it.

Freud himself had a neurosis, no doubt diagnosable and one with highly troublesome symptoms, as I had discovered on our voyage to America.

Of course he had taught me that everybody is somewhat neurotic, and that we must practice tolerance.

But I was not at all inclined to content myself with that; rather, I wanted to know how one could escape having a neurosis.

Apparently neither Freud nor his disciples could understand what it meant for the theory and practice of psychoanalysis if not even the master could deal with his own neurosis.

When, then, Freud announced his intention of identifying theory and method and making them into some kind of dogma, I could no longer collaborate with him; there remained no choice for me but to withdraw.

When I was working on my book about the libido and approaching the end of the chapter "The Sacrifice," I knew in advance that its publication would cost me my friendship with Freud.

For I planned to set down in it my own conception of incest, the decisive transformation of the concept of libido, and various other ideas in which I differed from Freud.

To me incest signified a personal complication only in the rarest cases.

Usually incest has a highly religious aspect, for which reason tie incest theme plays a decisive part in almost all cosmogonies and in numerous myths.

But Freud clung to the literal interpretation of it and could not grasp the spiritual significance of incest as a symbol.

I knew that he would never be able to accept any of my ideas on this subject.

I spoke with my wife about this, and told her of my fears.

She attempted to reassure me, for she thought that Freud would magnanimously raise no objections, although he might not accept my views.

I myself was convinced that he could not do so.

For two months I was unable to touch my pen, so tormented was I by the conflict.

Should I keep my thoughts to myself, or should I risk the loss of so important a friendship?

At last I resolved to go ahead with the writing and it did indeed cost me Freud’s friendship.

After the break with Freud, all my friends and acquaintances dropped away.

My book was declared to be rubbish; I was a mystic, and that settled the matter.

Riklin and Maeder alone stuck by me.

But I had foreseen my isolation and harbored no illusion about the reactions of my so-called friends.

That was a point I had thoroughly considered beforehand.

I had known that everything was at stake, and that I had to- take a stand for my convictions.

I realized that the chapter, "The Sacrifice” meant my own sacrifice.

Having reached this insight, I was able to write again, even though I knew that my ideas would go uncomprehended.

In retrospect I can say that I alone logically pursued the two problems which most interested Freud: the problem of "archaic vestiges/’ and that of sexuality.

It is a widespread error to imagine that I do not see the value of sexuality.

On the contrary, it plays a large part in my psychology as an essential though not the sole expression of psychic wholeness.

But my main concern has been to investigate, over and above its personal significance and biological function, its spiritual aspect and its numinous meaning, and thus to explain what Freud was so fascinated by but was unable to grasp.

My thoughts on this subject are contained in "The Psychology of the Transference" and the Mysterium Coniunctionis.

Sexuality is of the greatest importance as the expression of the chthonic spirit.

That spirit is the "other face of God," the dark side of the God-image.

The question of the chthonic spirit has occupied me ever since I began to delve into the world of alchemy.

Basically, this interest was awakened by that early conversation with Freud, when, mystified, I felt how deeply stirred he was by the phenomenon of sexuality.

Freud's greatest achievement probably consisted in taking neurotic patients seriously and entering into their peculiar individual psychology.

He had the courage to let the case material speak for itself, and in this way was able to penetrate into the real psychology of his patients.

He saw with the patient's eyes, so to speak, and so reached a deeper understanding of mental illness than had hitherto been possible.

In this respect he was free of bias, courageous, and succeeded in overcoming a host of prejudices.

Like an Old Testament prophet, he undertook to overthrow false gods, to rip the veils away from a mass of dishonesties and hypocrisies, mercilessly exposing the rottenness of the contemporary psyche.

He did not falter in the face of the unpopularity such an enterprise entailed.

The impetus which he gave to our civilization sprang from his discovery of an avenue to the unconscious.

By evaluating dreams as the most important source of information concerning the unconscious processes, he gave back to mankind a tool that had seemed irretrievably lost.

He demonstrated empirically the presence of an unconscious psyche which had hitherto existed only as a philosophical postulate, in particular in the philosophies of C. G. Cams and Eduard von Hartmann.

It may well be said that the contemporary cultural consciousness has not yet absorbed into its general philosophy the idea of the unconscious and all that it means, despite the fact that modern man has been confronted with this idea for more than half a century.

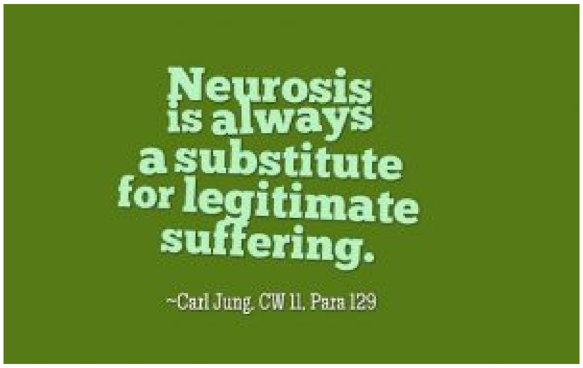
The assimilation of the fundamental insight that psychic life has two poles still remains a task for the future. Carl Jung, Memories, Dreams and Reflections, Pages 146-169

Carl Jung: Adler’s psychology does much greater justice to this situation than Freud’s. (2019-06-24 11:40)



Neurosis is always a substitute for legitimate suffering.
~Carl Jung, CW 11, Para 129

From Dr. Loy 23 February 1913

From your letter of 18 February I would like first to single out the end, where you so aptly assign the element of suggestion its proper place in psychoanalysis: "The patient is not an empty sack into which we can stuff whatever we like; he brings his own particular contents with him, with which you have always to reckon afresh" [sic].

With this I fully agree, as my own experience confirms it. And you add: involuntary analytic suggestions will leave this content intact, but the expression, Proteus-like, can be distorted without limit.

Hence it would be a kind of "mimicry," by which the patient seeks to escape the analyst who is driving him into a corner and for the moment seems to him an enemy.

Until at last, through the joint work of patient and analyst—the former spontaneously yielding up his psychic content, the latter only interpreting and explaining—the analysis succeeds in bringing so much light into the darkness of the patient’s psyche that he can see the true relationships and, without any preconceived plan of the analyst’s, draw the right conclusions and apply them to his future life.

This new life will follow the line of least resistance—or should we not rather say of least resistances—as a "compromise with all eventualities," in a just balancing of pain and pleasure.

It is not for us to decide arbitrarily for the patient how matters stand and what will benefit him; his own nature decides.

In other words, we should take over approximately the role of a midwife, who can only bring out into the light of day a child already alive, but who has to avoid a number of mistakes if the child is to remain alive and the mother is not to be injured.

All this is very clear to me because it is only an application to psychoanalytic procedure of a principle which should be generally valid: Never do violence to Nature! Hence I also see that the psychoanalyst must follow his patient’s apparently "erring ways" if the patient is ever to arrive at his own convictions and be freed once and for all from infantile reliance on authority.

We ourselves as individuals have learnt and can only learn by making mistakes how to avoid them in the future, and mankind as a whole has created the conditions for its present and future stages of development quite as much by following the crooked path as by keeping to the straight one.

Have not many neurotics—I do not know if you will agree, but I think so—become ill partly because their infantile faith in authority has gone to pieces?

Now they stand before the wreckage of their faith, weeping over it, and terrified because they cannot find a substitute which would show them clearly where they have to turn.

So they remain stuck between the infantilisms they are unwilling to renounce and the serious tasks of the present and future (moral conflict).

I also see, particularly in such cases, how right you are in saying that it would be a mistake to try to replace their lost faith in authority by another faith in authority, which would be useful only as long as it lasted.

This passes a verdict on the deliberate use of suggestive influence in psychoanalysis, and on regarding the "transference to the analyst" as the goal of analytic therapy.

I no longer contest your dictum: "Every interference on the part of the analyst is a gross mistake in technique. So-called chance is the law and order of psychoanalysis."

Further, I am in entire agreement when you say that altruism [sic] must necessarily be innate in man as a herd-animal.

The contrary would be the thing to wonder at.

I am very much inclined to assume that not the egoistic but the altruistic instincts are primary.

Love and trust of the child for the mother who feeds it, nurses, cherishes and pets it; love of man for wife, regarded as absorption in another's personality; love foroffspring, care of them; love for kinsfolk, etc.

Whereas the egoistic instincts owe their existence only to the desire for exclusive possession of the object of love, the desire to possess the mother exclusively, in opposition to the father and brother and sisters, the desire to have a woman for oneself alone, the desire for jewellery, clothes, etc. . . . But perhaps you will say I am being paradoxical and that the instincts, whether altruistic or egoistic, arise together in the heart of man, and that every instinct is ambivalent by nature.

But I ask: are our feelings and instincts really ambivalent? Are they perhaps bipolar? Can the qualities of emotions be compared at all? Is love really the opposite of hate?

Be that as it may, it is lucky that man carries his social imperatives within himself as an inborn necessity, otherwise our civilized humanity would be in a bad way, having to submit to laws imposed only from without: when the earlier religious faith in authority died out we would rapidly and infallibly fall into complete anarchy.

We would then have to ask ourselves whether it would not be better to try to maintain by force an exclusively religious belief in authority, as the Middle Ages did.

For the benefits of civilization, which strives to grant every individual as much outward freedom as is consistent with the freedom of others, would be well worth such a sacrifice as the sacrifice of free research.

But the age of this use of force against nature is past, civilized mankind has abandoned these erroneous ways, not out of caprice, but obeying an inner need, and therefore we may look forward with joyful anticipation to the future.

Mankind, advancing in knowledge and obeying its own law, will find its way across the ruins of faith in authority to the moral autonomy of the individual.

From Dr. Jung March 1913

At various places in your letters it has struck me that the problem of the "transference" seems to you particularly critical.

Your feeling is entirely justified. The transference is indeed at present the central problem of analysis.

You know that Freud regards the transference as a projection of infantile fantasies upon the analyst.

To that extent it is an infantile-erotic relationship.

However, seen from outside, and superficially, the thing does not always look like an infantile erotic relationship by any means.

So long as it is a case of a so-called positive transference, you can as a rule recognize the infantile-erotic content of the transference without much difficulty.

But if it is a so-called negative transference, you see nothing but violent resistances which sometimes disguise themselves in theoretical, seemingly critical or sceptical forms. In a certain sense the determining factor in these relationships is the patient’s relationship to authority, that is, in the last resort, to his father.

In both forms of transference the analyst is treated as if he were the father—either with affection or with hostility.

According to this view of the transference it acts as a resistance as soon as the question arises of resolving the infantile attitude.

But this form of transference must be destroyed in so far as the aim of analysis is the patient’s moral autonomy.

A lofty aim, you will say.

Lofty indeed, and far off, but still not altogether so remote, since it actually corresponds to one of the predominating trends of our stage of civilization—the urge towards individualization, which might serve as a motto for our whole epoch. (Cf. Muller-Lyer, The Family.)

Anyone who does not believe in this ultimate aim but still adheres to the old scientific causalism will naturally tend to take only the hostile element out of the transference and let the patient remain in a positive relationship to the father, in accordance with the ideals of a past epoch.

As we know, the Catholic Church is one of the most powerful organizations based on this tendency.

I do not venture to doubt that there are very many people who feel happier under the coercion of others than when forced to discipline themselves (see Shaw’s Man and Superman).

None the less, we would be doing our neurotic patients a grievous wrong if we tried to force them all into the category of the coerced.

Among neurotics, there are not a few who do not require any reminders of their social duties and obligations, but are born and destined rather to be bearers of new cultural ideals.

They are neurotic as long as they bow down before authority and refuse the freedom to which they are destined.

As long as we look at life only retrospectively, as is the case in the psychoanalytic writings of the Viennese school, we shall never do justice to these persons and never bring them the longed-for deliverance.

For in this way we train them only to be obedient children and thereby strengthen the very forces that made them ill—their conservative backwardness and submission to authority.

Up to a point this is the right way to take with people suffering from an infantile insubordination who cannot yet adapt to authority.

But the impulse which drives the others out of their conservative father-relationship is by no means an infantile wish for insubordination; it is a powerful urge to develop their own personality, and the struggle for this is for them an imperative duty.

Adler's psychology does much greater justice to this situation than Freud's.

For one type of person (called the infantile-rebel) a positive transference is, to begin with, an important achievement with a healing significance; for the other (the infantile-obedient) it is a dangerous backsliding, a convenient way of evading life's duties.

For the first a negative transference denotes increased insubordination, hence a backsliding and an evasion of life's duties, for the second it is a step forward with a healing significance.

(For the two types see Adler, "Trotz und Gehorsam," Monatshefte filr Pddagogik und Schulpolitik, VIII, 1910.)

So the transference must, as you see, be evaluated quite differently according to the type of case.

The psychological process of transference—whether negative or positive—consists in a "libidinal investment" of the personality of the analyst, that is to say he stands for an emotional value.

(As you know, by libido I mean very much what the ancients meant by the cosmogonic principle of Eros, or in modern language, "psychic energy.")

The patient is bound to the analyst by ties of affection or resistance and cannot help following and imitating his psychic attitude.

By this means he feels his way along (empathy).

And with the best will in the world and for all his technical skill the analyst cannot prevent it, for empathy works surely and instinctively in spite of conscious judgment, be it never so strong.

If the analyst himself is neurotic and insufficiently adapted to the demands of life or of his own personality, the patient will copy this defect and reflect it in his own attitudes: with what results you can imagine.

Accordingly I cannot regard the transference merely as a projection of infantile-erotic fantasies.

No doubt that is what it is from one standpoint, but I also see in it, as I said in an earlier letter, a process of empathy and adaptation.

From this standpoint, the infantile-erotic fantasies, in spite of their undeniable reality, appear rather as a means of comparison or as analogical images for something not yet understood than as independent wishes.

This seems to me the real reason why they are unconscious.

The patient, not knowing the right attitude, tries to grasp at the right relationship to the analyst by way of comparison and analogy with his infantile experiences.

It is not surprising that he gropes back to just the most intimate relationships of his childhood in the attempt to discover the appropriate formula for his relationship to the analyst, for this relationship is very intimate too but differs from the sexual relationship as much as does that of a child to its parents.

This latter relationship—child to parent—which Christianity has everywhere set up as a symbolic formula for human relationships in general, serves to restore to the patient that direct feeling of human fellowship of which he has been deprived by the incursions of sexual and social valuations (valuations from the standpoint of power, etc.).

The purely sexual and other more or less primitive and barbaric valuations militate against a direct, purely human relationship, and this creates a damming up of libido which may easily give rise to neurotic formations.

Through analysis of the infantile content of the transference fantasies the patient is brought back to a remembrance of the childhood relationship, which, stripped of its infantile qualities, gives him a clear picture of a direct human relationship over and above merely sexual valuations, etc.

I can only regard it as a misconception to judge the child-relationship retrospectively as a merely sexual one, even though a certain sexual content cannot be denied.

Recapitulating, I would like to say this of the positive transference: The patient's libido fastens on the person of the analyst in the form of expectation, hope, interest, trust, friendship, and love.

The transference first produces a projection of infantile fantasies, often with a predominantly erotic tinge.

At this stage it is, as a rule, of a decidedly sexual character, even though the sexual component remains relatively unconscious.

But this emotional process serves as a bridge for the higher aspect of empathy, whereby the patient becomes conscious of the inadequacy of his own attitude through recognition of the analyst's attitude, which is accepted as being adapted to life's demands and as normal.

Through remembrance of the childhood relationship with the help of analysis the patient is shown the way which leads out of the subsidiary, purely sexual or power values acquired in puberty and reinforced by social prejudice.

This road leads to a purely human relationship and to an intimacy based not on the existence of sexual or power factors but on the value of personality.

That is the road to freedom which the analyst should show his patient.

I ought not to conceal from you at this point that the stubborn assertion of sexual values would not be maintained so tenaciously if they did not have a profound significance for that period of life in which propagation is of primary importance.

The discovery of the value of human personality is reserved for a riper age. For young people the search for personality values is very often a pretext for evading their biological duty.

Conversely, the exaggerated longing of an older person for the sexual values of youth is a short-sighted and often cowardly evasion of a duty which demands recognition of the value of personality and submission to the hierarchy of cultural values.

The young neurotic shrinks back in terror from the expansion of life's duties, the old one from the dwindling of the treasures he has attained.

This view of the transference is, as you will have observed, closely connected with the acceptance of biological "duties."

By this I mean the tendencies or determinants that produce culture in man with the same logic as in the bird they produce the artfully woven nest, and antlers in the stag.

The purely causal, not to say materialistic views of the last few decades seek to explain all organic formation as the reaction of living matter, and though this is undoubtedly a heuristically valuable line of inquiry, as far as any real explanation goes it amounts only to a more or less ingenious postponement and apparent minimizing of the problem.

I would remind you of Bergson's excellent criticism in this respect.

External causes can account for at most half the reaction, the other half is due to the peculiar attributes of living matter itself, without which the specific reaction formation could never come about at all.

We have to apply this principle also in psychology.

The psyche does not merely react, it gives its own specific answer to the influences at work upon it, and at least half the resulting formation is entirely due to the psyche and the determinants inherent within it.

Culture can never be understood as reaction to environment. That shallow explanation can safely be left to the past century.

It is just these determinants that appear as psychological imperatives, and we have daily proof of their compelling power.

What I call "biological duty" is identical with these determinants.

In conclusion, I must take up one point which seems to have caused you uneasiness. That is the moral question.

Among our patients we observe so many so-called immoral impulses that the thought involuntarily forces itself on the psychotherapist how it would be if all these desires were gratified.

You will have seen from my earlier letters that these desires should not be taken too seriously.

Mostly they are boundlessly exaggerated demands which are thrust to the forefront by the patient's dammed-up libido, usually against his will.

The canalizing of libido for the fulfilment of life's simple duties is in most cases sufficient to reduce the pressure of these desires to zero.

But in certain cases it is a recognized fact that "immoral" tendencies are not got rid of by analysis, but appear more and more clearly until it becomes evident that they belong to the biological duties of the individual.

This is particularly true of certain sexual demands aiming at an individual evaluation of sexuality.

This is not a question for pathology, it is a social question of today which imperatively demands an ethical solution.

For many it is a biological duty to work for a solution of this question, i.e., to find some sort of practical solution. (Nature, as we know, is not satisfied with theories.)

Nowadays we have no real sexual morality, only a legalistic attitude to sexuality; just as the Middle Ages had no real morality of money-making but only prejudices and a legalistic point of view.

We are not yet far enough advanced to distinguish between moral and immoral behaviour in the realm of free sexual activity. This is clearly expressed in the customary treatment, or rather ill-treatment, of unmarried mothers.

All the repulsive hypocrisy, the high tide of prostitution and of venereal diseases, we owe to the barbarous, wholesale legal condemnation of certain kinds of sexual behaviour, and to our inability to develop a finer moral sense for the enormous psychological differences that exist in the domain of free sexual activity.

The existence of this exceedingly complicated and significant contemporary problem may serve to make clear to you why we so often find among our patients people who, because of their spiritual and social gifts, are quite specifically called to take an active part in the work of civilization—that is their biological destiny.

We should never forget that what today seems to us a moral commandment will tomorrow be cast into the melting-pot and transformed, so that in the near or distant future it may serve as a basis for new ethical formations.

This much we ought to have learnt from the history of civilization, that the forms of morality belong to the category of transitory things.

The finest psychological tact is needed with these sensitive natures if they are to turn the dangerous corner of infantile irresponsibility, indolence, or licentiousness, and to give the patient a clear and unclouded vision of the possibility of morally autonomous behaviour.

Five per cent on money lent is fair interest, twenty per cent is despicable usury. We have to apply this view to the sexual situation as well.

So it comes about that there are many neurotics whose inner decency prevents them from being at one with present-day morality and who cannot adapt themselves so long as the moral code has gaps in it which it is the crying need of our age to fill.

We deceive ourselves greatly if we think that many married women are neurotic merely because they are unsatisfied sexually or because they have not found the right man or because they have an infantile sexual fixation. The real reason in many cases is that they cannot recognize the cultural task that is waiting for them.

We all have far too much the standpoint of the "nothing but" psychology, that is, we still think that the new future which is pressing in at the door can be squeezed into the framework of what is already known.

And so these people see only the present and not the future.

It was of profound psychological significance when Christianity first proclaimed that the orientation to the future was the redeeming principle for mankind.

In the past nothing can be altered, and in the present little, but the future is ours and capable of raising life’s intensity to the highest pitch. A little span of youth belongs to us, all the rest belongs to our children.

Thus your question about the significance of the loss of faith in authority answers itself.

The neurotic is ill not because he has lost his old faith, but because he has not yet found a new form for his finest aspirations. Jung/Loy Letters, CW 4, Para 652-669

There are four categories of repression to be seen throughout history: (2019-06-25 03:12)

There are four categories of repression to be seen throughout history:

1. The exclusion of Nature:

This attitude led to a neglect of nature. This is shown by the art of the period. The line of the drawings bore no resemblance to nature, neither did the Dolor used, e.g. the hair might be painted green and the trees red; or by writing town instead of drawing it. This lasted till the pre-Raphaelites.

In this came period the ideals were anti-natural. For example, saints tried to be as dirty as possible. Saints did not wash, they lived in filth and vermin which they praised as the smells of heavenly roses.

Fakir practices also occurred in Christianity. These people were psychological examples of the fact that the spirit can rule the flesh.

This state of affairs had to go on till the spirit actually became stronger than the flesh, then when it had become overdue, then it began to decay.

The overcoming of the world, of carnal wishes, as in the monasteries, was a tremendous reality in those days, it really mattered.

2. The exclusion of the animal world.

Animals were really excluded. There was no artistic appreciation of the animal till the ox and the ass came in at the margin of the picture perhaps. In the gospels there is no appreciation of the animal as a living being equivalent to the Hindu attitude.
For example, there is no cathedral where monuments of the horses who had fallen in carrying the stone were set up. In medieval times the animal was grotesque, half devil. In the very early Church there are exceptions, a sacred leopard, ass, etc. St. Francis of Assisi was an exception, but he was a heretic end only by the cleverness of the Pope was his revolution undone and he was swept into the lap of the Church.

This exclusion shows a tendency to repress the parallelism of the human and the animal. These exclusions mean that humanity becomes very isolated. When this happens you feel that you have fallen from grace, for you cannot drink from the wells of nature and then you must seek for grace elsewhere. Indeed, the Church has brought this condition of affairs about for this very purpose.
3. Exclusion of the Inferior Man, the weak or incapable one in us.

The Old Adam, the inferior and inert being in us, was recognized everywhere but was burdened with curses; he almost was the inherited sin. He is destined for hell. Any form of indulgence is closely linked with the Old Adam, ego]. sexuality.

In as much as the Old Adam was repressed by the Church, sexuality was also repressed, except for the purposes of propagation.
To produce as many children as possible, to make as many souls as possible for Cod’s flock was meritorious. In South America the Church bell rang to remind the men to heed the need for propagation. It is rather sexuality as erotic expression that was repressed.

Sexuality has two faces, (a) propagation which is more carnal sexuality; (b) erotic expression.

This is little known because the Church says it is all of the devil and belongs to the inferior man.

There are political reasons why this should he. When the erotic side is allowed to a man, he can recognize his dignity. He can live satisfactorily to himself. The Church has to repress this or non feels that his life has a meaning and is important to himself, and then he will not need the Church.

1. Repression of creative phantasy, end of its freedom. Creative phantasy is allowed for propagation and for church windows. But where it is free it is forbidden, that is, where it does not follow the traditional form. Wherever a man feels himself the brother of the gods, he is self-sufficient.

Then he remember° his divinity. The Church is most of all against this.

This is why Galileo was persecuted, because his invention was creative and subversive to the teachings of Aristotle. Such men were persecuted for having creative phantasy. The Church murders the germ of things, and this is the murder of God for the germs of things are divine. Thus does the Church become the devil incarnate.

But no Church has been able to kill the divine in man. So at the Renaissance the Divine freed itself from the Church and lived elsewhere, and this in spite of the saying, "Outside the Church is no salvation."

That is eternal death. It is a terrible mutilation when man is compelled to live only by a truth two thousand years old and thereby sacrifice his actual life to a mummy.

But outside of the Church there is no impersonal formulation.

At first we enjoy our liberation from the bondage of the Church. For instance, you find it in the music of Bach or Handel, where there is the joy of the Protestant for the liberation from Papacy. But in a couple of hundred years, the joy sank out of sight and everything became like old leather, because Protestantism is only a protest, not a real life. But this joy was of the eighteenth century and we cannot go back to it, that would be regression and regression is sin.

In the apocryphal sayings of Jesus we find the followings The disciples asked: "Who will draw us up to heaven, and Jesus spake unto them The fowls in the air and the fishes in the sea and the beasts on the earth shall draw you to heaven."

And again "Where there are two I am there, and where one is alone I am there also. Break the rock, cleave the wood, I am there."
In the sermon on the Mount, when it is read subjectively in the Gnostic form one reads: "If thou bringest thy gift to the altar and there findest that thy brother hath aught against thee, go and be reconciled to thy brother. Thy brother is thyself, therefore be reconciled to thyself…" Carl Jung, Carl Jung, Cornwall Seminar, Pages 16-18.

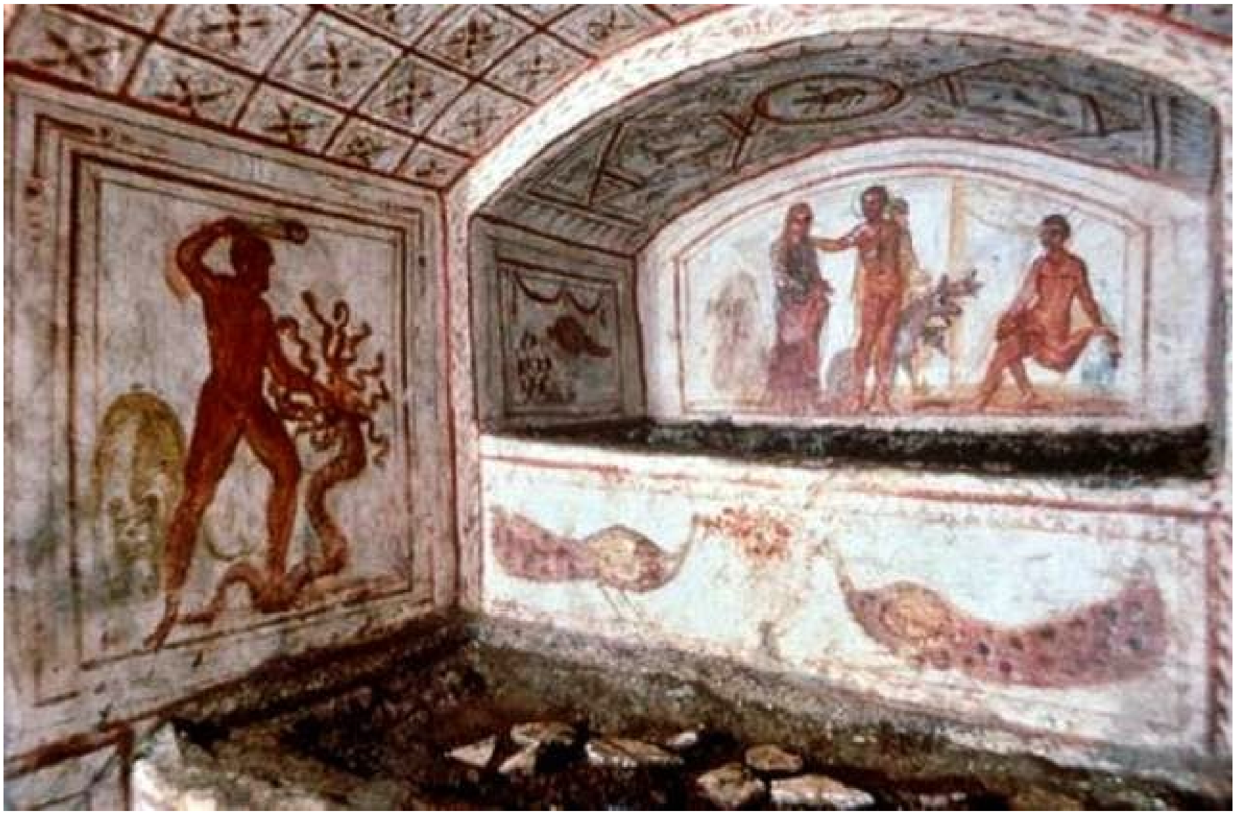
Carl Jung About the effect of the collective expression of an unconscious attitude. (2019-06-25 03:29)

[1]



About the effect of the collective expression of an unconscious attitude.

When an unconditioned attitude is expressed collectively as a religion, it must necessarily be formulated; this means that it must be given a form, which in turn means the establishment of an institution.

As soon as this happens, the spirit goes because the Church is a form, that is a body; the spirit becomes flesh. But it can be a living body, yet this is no longer the spiritual life of the origins.

From the time of Constantine the Great, the Church swallowed the spirit.

Thus when the Church appeared it was the second death of Christ, not the birth of the Church.

Throughout the ages in many individuals the spirit was born again, but they were heretics and mystics.

The real thing was carried in them but always in opposition to the Church.

The psychological life that had given birth to the Church was in opposition to the ruling power of the state.

The power came from the invasion of the unconscious.

Christ was a flame and kindled the fire in the dry wood, until the greater part of the world was aflame.

Then came the Church which took on a form and became an institution and the Church was no longer a fire.

The first centuries were characterized by many dissentions, heresies, etc., within the frame of the Church.

This was the motive for the Shepherd of Hermes.

The power of this book was due to the fact that the unconscious of the people was seeking a form.

The religious spirit is actually flame, compare the Flames of Fire at Pentecost. In the actual world this means destruction.

As soon as the spirit causes a clinging together of those who have experienced it, they form an institution and the spirit dies.

The flame dies out. The body, or institution, is alive too but it is no longer the fire of the original religious phenomenon.

People vary very much in their relation to these problems; some prefer the settled thing, while others, the revolutionaries, prefer the fire.

But to the Old Man in us it is painful to walk into the fire. He seeks an institution because of its regularity and safety.

The revolutionaries will find a sword not peace. They must go out and fight; they are on fire; but they repel, even each other.

This explosive form is shown in early Christianity. It will also happen in analysis. It is sad; but it works, for the members are scattered and so the now spirit is disseminated abroad. This is necessary for the beginning of any kind of movement.

In the beginning of the Christian movement, the Community Meal played a very important part.

It was around this economic necessity that the institution began to be formed.

The community meal arose from the Insurance Brotherhoods of Rome.

These were cooperative societies for eating; had a clerk-cook, and they were under patron Herea [spelling?]of which probably Christ was one. The clerk-cook became Priest and still had charge of preparing the Host and Wine and the care of the cooperative money. Carl Jung, Cornwall Seminar, Pages 18-19.

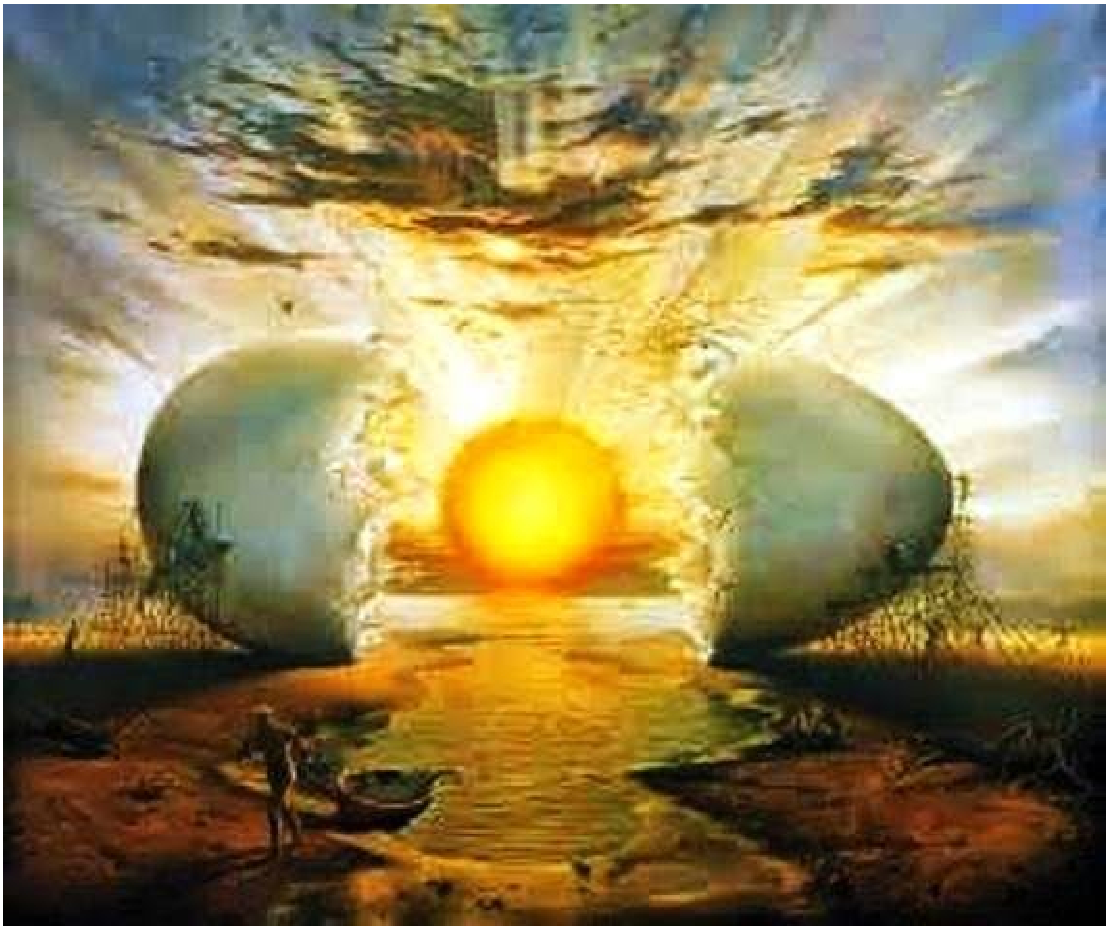
Carl Jung on how you can become your own Sun-Rise. (2019-06-25 04:02)



[Carl Jung on how you can become your own Sun-Rise.]

The collective unconscious must be thought of as a world of images equivalent to the outer world which, is the world of real objects.

This formulation must be limited, however, by the recognition that both worlds are psychological functions only, that is, they are subjective.

The collective unconscious is also defined as the unknown side of objective reality. Anima and animus are as it were messengers from the world of unknown images to our consciousness (op. persona).

We can never enter the collective unconscious but we can send the anima or animus to bring us information.

By making things with your hands without conscious intent you find a vision of the things of the unconscious.

The inspiration working through your hands is animus or anima.

This function is personified, and we consider it as intelligent.

So we should talk to our animus or anima.

To do this requires a certain dissociation, allowing the side associations to come up, and from these you can conclude the character of the ruler of these side associations.

In difficult situations you talk to yourself, intuitively knowing that you are yourself and also that other.

So you listen to the inner mentor, you develop the inner ear; or you write automatically, and a word is formed by your hand, or your mouth speaks that which you have not thought.

Where one is identified with the collective unconscious, there is no recognition of the things which come from the unconscious, they cannot be distinguished from those of the self.

Such a condition is a possession by the anima or animus.

Possession by the animus or anima creates a certain psychological hermaphroditism.

The principle of individuation demands a dissociation or differentiation of the male and the female in ourselves.

We must dissociate our self from the unconscious.

In states of excitement we speak to ourselves as though to an excited horse, that bit is the part possessed by the anima. In a woman the animus is multiform so that he cannot be nailed down so wall as the anima.

When you can establish a communication between yourself and your to your other side, you begin a certain development.

Then the anima begins to function properly, and you begin to find that the anima begins to function properly, and you begin to find that the anima has certain qualities behind her, and you can learn of her power.

You can learn about the contents of the collective unconscious.

Then the anima becomes less and less a personification, she becomes a function, but only when the collective unconscious is exhausted, when the constellated problems or images have been realized; that is, when you have already obtained an impersonal attitude.

The result brought about by communion with the anima results in individuation.

By this objectivation you are detached from those things to which you were identified.

Formerly the emotion had you, but by this objectivation you learn what you really are, you cut yourself out of the historical process; you fit yourself to be no longer just the product of the historical process.

You become the maker of the now day; you are your own sun-rise.

Until we do this, we are merely the result of the past.

But, by achieving this connection with the soul figure, you become the ruler of your own fate. Carl Jung; Cornwall Seminar, Pages 26-27

When the Romans became Christian... (2019-06-25 04:04)

[1]

Sean McLachlan

When the Romans became Christian, the old pagan world went down into the unconscious, into oblivion.

There, there were already the old nature spirits. Then the old gods go down into the depths of the mountains.

Wotan, for example, who moves in storms at night. The recognized gods of the day go down into the night.

There they civilize the unconscious; they will gradually domesticate the unconscious.

These attempts at individuation are sending missionaries to the unconscious, to baptize the heathen world of the unconscious.

We do this same job on ourselves.

This Christianizing of the unconscious is observable through analysis.

The unconscious becomes more manageable. In time we shall have the whole Christian church in our unconscious. Carl Jung, Cornwall Seminar, Page 25.

Carl Jung: The staff represents guidance (2019-06-25 04:05)

[1]

The staff represents guidance; it will become a guide as an inner law when someone came into the inner ring of fire and remains suspended in the soul fire.

In humility we stay on hanging in the fire, until we are burned up.

That's how the transformation of the ego into spiritual, immortal man goes.

There are many mythological images of this: Isis holds the little son of the king of Phoenicia over the fire at night to make him immortal.

But once the mother happens on this, she cries out loud; Isis quickly has to draw the child out of the fire, and immortality is lost. Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 102.

Carl Jung's Letters on the Death of Albert Oeri (2019-06-25 04:18)

Dear Dr. Oeri, [Albert Oeri's wife]

The great tiredness I saw and felt in my friend on my visit to Basel has now run speedily to its end. The dead are surely not to be pitied—they have so infinitely much more before them than we do—but rather the living who are left behind, who must contemplate the fleetingness of existence and suffer parting, sorrow, and loneliness in time.

I know what Albert's death must mean to you for with him my last living friend has also departed. We are but a remnant of the past, more and more so with each coming year. Our eyes turn away from the future of the human world in which our children, but not ourselves, will live.

Enviable the lot of those who have crossed the threshold, yet my compassion goes out to those who, in the darkness of the world, hemmed in by a narrow horizon and the blindness of ignorance, must follow the river of their days, fulfilling life's task, only to see their whole existence, which once was the present rimming with power and vitality, crumbling bit by bit and crashing into the abyss.

This spectacle of old age would be unendurable did we not know that our psyche reaches into a region held captive neither by change in time nor by limitation of place. In that form of being our birth is a death and our death a birth. The scales of the whole hand balanced. With heartfelt sympathy,

Yours sincerely, C.G. Jung. [Letter dated December 23, 1950]

Dear Regula, [Albert Oeri's third daughter]

I would like to express my heartfelt sympathy on the death of your father, with whom I was bound for so long in true friendship. When the vital forces fail, when participating in life is an effort, and the great tiredness settles over everything, death brings the boon of sleep. Once the world has sunk down, there is no desire to see it rise up again.

It is only we, the living, who have lost something, and lament this loss. All things pass away, graves are the milestones of existence. For the young, the death of the parents opens a new chapter of life: They are now the carriers of life and the present, and nothing hangs over them any more except an as yet unfulfilled destiny. May you go towards it with all the courage it needs,

Most cordially, C.G. Jung [Letter dated December 23, 1950]

Carl Jung on Materials Constellated in the Unconscious Through Ecclesiastical Christianity.

(2019-06-25 04:36)

[1]

Materials Constellated in the Unconscious Through Ecclesiastical Christianity.

It is necessary to differentiate carefully between Ecclesiastical Christianity and the Real Christianity of Christ's teaching.
Ecclesiastical Christianity does not work; do not confuse this with the real religious attitude which works naturally, but which is not necessarily Christian.

Those things which are repressed by the specific attitude of Christianity are to be found in the unconscious. What are these?

It is not easy to say by only looking into your own life, but it can be more easily discerned by a historical survey.
There are four categories of repression to be seen throughout history:

1. The exclusion of Nature:

This attitude led to a neglect of nature. This is shown by the art of the period. The line of the drawings bore no resemblance to nature, neither did the Dolor used, e.g. the hair might be painted green and the trees red; or by writing town instead of drawing it. To produce as many children as possible, to make as many souls as possible for Cod’s flock was meritorious. In South America the Church bell rang to remind the men to heed the need for propagation. It is rather sexuality as erotic expression that was repressed.

Sexuality has two faces, (a) propagation which is more carnal sexuality; (b) erotic expression.

This is little known because the Church says it is all of the devil and belongs to the inferior man.

There are political reasons why this should he. When the erotic side is allowed to a man, he can recognize his dignity. He can live satisfactorily to himself. The Church has to repress this or non feels that his life has a meaning and is important to himself, and then he will not need the Church.

4. Repression of creative phantasy, end of its freedom. Creative phantasy is allowed for propagation and for church windows. But where it is free it is forbidden, that is, where it does not follow the traditional form. Wherever a man feels himself the brother of the gods, he is self-sufficient.

Then he remember° his divinity. The Church is most of all against this.

This is why Galileo was persecuted, because his invention was creative and subversive to the teachings of Aristotle. Such men were persecuted for having creative phantasy. The Church murders the germ of things, and this is the murder of God for the germs of things are divine. Thus does the Church become the devil incarnate.

But no Church has been able to kill the divine in man. So at the Renaissance the Divine freed itself from the Church and lived elsewhere, and this in spite of the saying, "Outside the Church is no salvation."

That is eternal death. It is a terrible mutilation when man is compelled to live only by a truth two thousand years old and thereby sacrifice his actual life to a mummy.

But outside of the Church there is no impersonal formulation.

At first we enjoy our liberation from the bondage of the Church. For instance, you find it in the music of Bach or Handel, where there is the joy of the Protestant for the liberation from Papacy. But in a couple of hundred years, the joy sank out of sight and everything became like old leather, because Protestantism is only a protest, not a real life. But this joy was of the eighteenth century and we cannot go back to it, that would be regression and regression is sin.

In the apocryphal sayings of Jesus we find the followings The disciples asked: "Who will draw us up to heaven, and Jesus spake unto them The fowls in the air and the fishes in the sea and the beasts on the earth shall draw you to heaven."

And again "Where there are two I am there, and where one is alone I am there also. Break the rock, cleave the wood, I am there."
In the sermon on the Mount, when it is read subjectively in the Gnostic form one reads: "If thou bringest thy gift to the altar and there findest that thy brother hath aught against thee, go and be reconciled to thy brother.Thy brother is thyself, therefore be reconciled to thyself.." Carl Jung, Cornwall Seminar, Pages 16-19.

Carl Jung on “Wisdom” Anthology (2019-06-25 05:14)

[1]

[Carl Jung on “Wisdom” Anthology]

Tears, sorrow, and disappointment are bitter, but wisdom is the comforter in all psychic suffering. Indeed, bitterness and wisdom form a pair of alternatives: where there is bitterness wisdom is lacking, and where wisdom is there can be no bitterness. Carl Jung; CW 20; Mysterium Coniunctionis; Page 246; Para 330.

The soul demands your folly; not your wisdom. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 264.

If one could arrive at the truth by learning the words of wisdom, then the world would have been saved already in the remote times of Lao-tze. Carl Jung, Letters Volume 1, Pages 559-560.

At all events wisdom cannot be taught by words. It is only possible by personal contact and by immediate experience. Carl Jung, Letters Volume 1, Pages 559-560.

Yahweh [God] must become man precisely because he has done man a wrong. He, the guardian of justice, knows that every wrong must be expiated, and Wisdom knows that moral law is above even him. Because his creature has surpassed him he must regenerate himself. Carl Jung; Book of Job; Para. 640.

That higher and "complete" man is begotten by the "unknown" father and born from Wisdom, and it is he who, in the figure of the puer aeternus—"vultu metabolism albums et ater"—represents our totality, which transcends consciousness. It was this boy into whom Faust had to change, abandoning his inflated onesidedness which saw the devil only outside. Christ's "Except ye become as little children" is a prefiguration of this, for in them the opposites lie close together; but what is meant is the boy who is born from the maturity of the adult man, and not the unconscious child we would like to remain. Carl Jung; Answer to Job, R. Hull, trans. (1984), pp. 157-158

I . . . have the feeling that this is a time full of marvels, and, if the auguries do not deceive us, it may very well be that . . . we are on the threshold of something really sensational, which I scarcely know how to describe except with the Gnostic concept of [Sophia], an Alexandrian term particularly suited to the reincarnation of ancient wisdom in the shape of ΨA. Carl Jung, The Freud/Jung Letters, Page 439

Nature itself speaks in such dreams. The wisdom of the child is the wisdom of nature, and it needs the utmost cunning to follow nature. Carl Jung, Children's Dream Seminar, Page 136.

The motif of the net is the attribute of wisdom, it represents the logos and is the net of understanding in which the Mother can be caught. Carl Jung, Modern Psychology, Vol. 2, Page 148.

No doubt the anima has a very important aspect as a giver of wisdom. She is the femme inspiratrice par excellence. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 498-499.

Thus the anima is always associated with the source of wisdom and enlightenment, whose symbol is the Old Wise Man. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 498-499.

Since man's nature is temperamentally set against wisdom, it is incumbent upon us to pay its price by what seems foolish to us. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Letters, II, 580.

Where is the wisdom of our old people, where are their precious secrets and their visions? For the most part our old people try to compete with the young. In the United States it is almost an ideal for a father to be the brother of his sons, and for the mother to be if possible the younger sister of her daughter. Carl Jung, CW 8, ¶788.

Wisdom is never violent: where wisdom reigns there is no conflict between thinking and feeling. Carl Jung, Mysterium Coniunctionis, Page 249, Para 334.

But besides that there is a thinking in primordial images, in symbols which are older than the historical man, which are inborn in him from the earliest times, and, eternally living, outlasting all generations, still make up the groundwork of the human psyche. It is only possible to live the fullest life when we are in harmony with these symbols; wisdom is a return to them. Carl Jung, CW 8, Pages 399-403.

Nevertheless, I console myself with the thought that only a fool expects wisdom. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. 1, Pages 515-516.

The spirit of God’s wisdom = the Holy Ghost. Carl Jung, ETH, Page 160.

Here is a piece of the superior wisdom of the East. The Yogin realizes that all the Buddhas, Bodhisattvas and Devatas with which he has filled the heavens are Maya illusion just as the world itself is Maya. All this plurality is illusion. Carl Jung, ETH Lecture XI, 3Feb1939, Page 74.

You are no Christian and no pagan, but a hospitable inhospitable one, a host of the Gods, a survivor, an eternal one, the father of all eternal wisdom. Carl Jung to Philemon, Liber Novus, Page 315.

The righteous base their intentions more on the mercy of God, which in whatever they undertake they trust more than their own wisdom. Carl Jung citing The Imitation of Christ, Liber Novus, Page 294.

The word is the God that rises out of the waters each morning and proclaims the guiding law to the people. Outer laws and outer wisdom are eternally insufficient, since there is only one law and one wisdom, namely my daily law, my daily wisdom. The God renews himself each night. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 311.

I must free my self from the God, since the God I experienced is more than love; he is also hate, he is more than beauty, he is also the abomination, he is more than wisdom, he is also meaninglessness, he is more than power, he is also powerlessness, he is more than omnipresence, he is also my creature. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 339.

Everything now depends on man; immense power of destruction is given into his hands, and the question is whether he can resist the will to use it, and can temper his will with the spirit of love and wisdom. He will hardly be able to do so on his own resources. He needs the help of an "advocate" in heaven. Carl Jung, CW 11, Page 459.

In the last analysis, most of our difficulties come from losing contact with our instincts, with the age-old unforgotten wisdom stored up in us. And where do we make contact with this old man in us? In our dreams. Carl Jung, Psychological Reflections, 76.

Hoyle has the rotundum, the doctrine of the Anthropos, the cosmic wisdom of matter, which he naturally confuses with consciousness, and so fails to do justice to the problem of suffering. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Page 408.

Together the patient and I address ourselves to the 2,000,000-year-old man that is in all of us. In the last analysis, most of our difficulties come from losing contact with our instincts, with the age-old unforgotten wisdom stored up in us. Carl Jung, NY Times, October 4, 1936.

Wisdom seeks the middle path and pays for this audacity by a dubious affinity with daemon and beast and so is open to moral interpretation. Carl Jung, CW 9i, Archetypes of the Collective Unconscious, Page 231, Para 420

Carl Jung on How do the things excluded by Christianity live in the unconscious? (2019-06-26 03:51)

How do the things excluded by Christianity live in the unconscious?

There is only an indirect method of approach to this problem, for something that is unconscious cannot be directly observed.

1. The exclusion of Nature. (a) Nature when it is in the unconscious shows itself in the form of certain peculiar relationships of a primitive character with perhaps a magic significance. For example, certain people feel themselves under the necessity to risk their lives in climbing certain mountains.

The mountain seems to have a peculiar mane, it is almost a divine personage worthy to have a human sacrifice, and a particular grace is obtained by risking one's life there. This can never be explained rationally.

In Switzerland, the mountains are replacing the Church as the object which calls forth a non-personal spirit and devotion. The mountain-tops are particular churches which call forth emotions which the climbers cannot understand, but which may be really transforming. This is a sort of nature cult. Here you may expect the working of nature demons. When a primitive says Tree, he means the noumen of the tree. When primitive nature is in an unconscious state, one may expect these things to be alive. So we should expect nature demons in our lifetime. In the last fifty years, such demons have been manifested in spiritistic seances with its table turning, and with objects talking to each other. These are manifestations of nature demons.

The more the immediate relation to nature is repressed the more do such things appear. e.g. Christian Science really works by the magic of immediate relationships. Here the natural demons are not personified, they are non-personal nature spirits.

(b) At a later state we get nature gods. This is particularly important because it was at this stage that the religious development of the Germanic peoples was cut down. Christianity cut down the old trees and inoculated the new faith. Here is a sore spot, a trauma. If we make a regression, it is likely to be to this phase where each man has his own kabir or his own god. In the war each nation had its own god; it is only one stage further to a point where each man says, "My god says:" This is one of the risks of individuation, where each person has his own god. True we must have an individual experience of god, and it will begin on a very low level. It will be a sort of individual poly-demonism.

(c) The emphasis on the nature of our own body. This produces the hygienic and eugenic attitude to life. This is also a god. Also the emphasis falls on everything physical. The attention is concentrated on the value of the personal, i.e., on money which becomes a god. In so far as you give up money for an idea is the idea more god than money. The strongest value in man is his god, and we serve him with conviction and with fear and trembling.

The service of the body is no great that we must say that there is a lot of god in the physical body, perhaps greater than in spirit. In all the strongest value, the greatest psychological value or fact that is god. The thing you cannot sacrifice is stronger than you; that is god. If that is so, you must acknowledge it, for that makes all the difference between a morel and an immoral attitude to life.

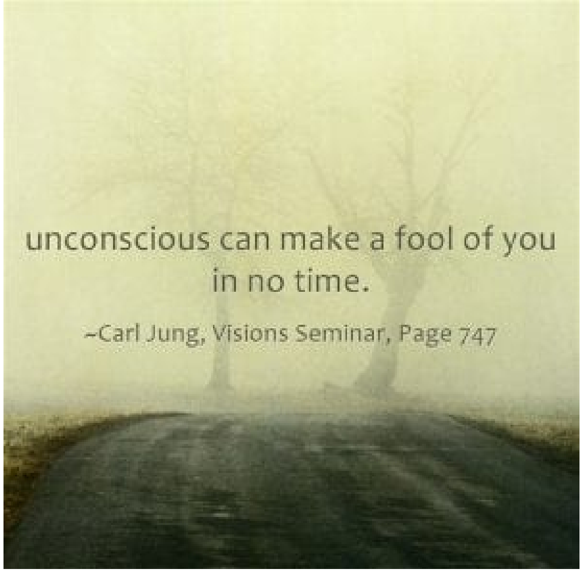
Some Carl Jung Quotations (2019-06-26 04:23)



unconscious can make a fool of you in no time.

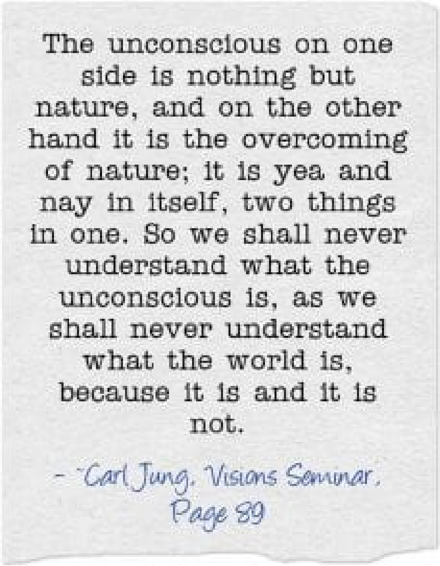
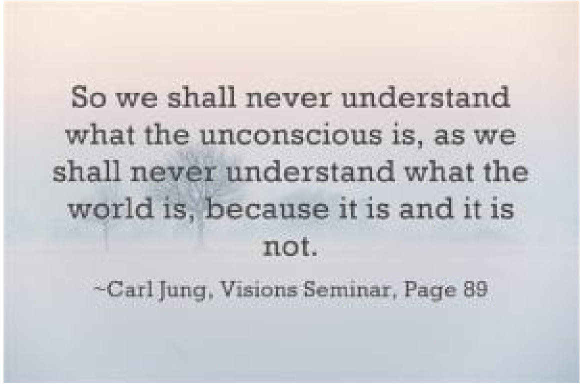
It is surely not the divine will in man that he should be something which he is not, for when one looks into nature, one sees that it is most definitely the divine will that everything should be what it is.

~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 569



The unconscious on one side is nothing but nature, and on the other hand it is the overcoming of nature; it is yea and nay in itself, two things in one. So we shall never understand what the unconscious is, as we shall never understand what the world is, because it is and it is not.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 89



So we shall never understand what the unconscious is, as we shall never understand what the world is, because it is and it is not.

So the Self is part of the collective unconscious, but it is not the collective unconscious; it is that unit which apparently comes from the union of the ego and the shadow.

Just as the Self is a unit in the collective unconscious, so we are units in the Self.

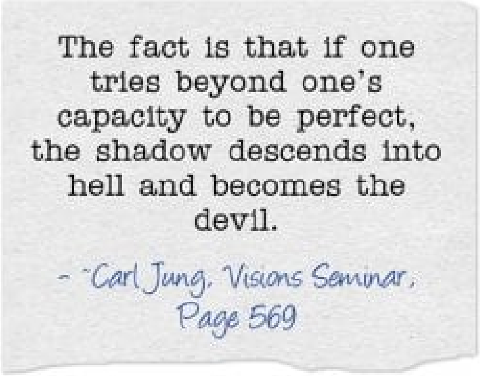
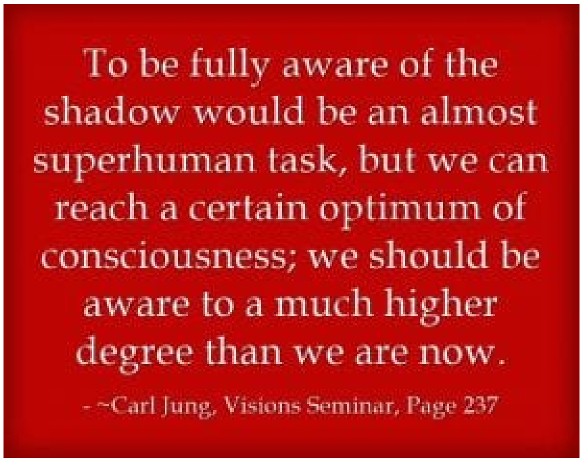
In the unconscious one cannot judge because of the great darkness there, but in the conscious there is light, and so there are differences; there is a criterion in consciousness which gives one a measure by which to judge.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 898



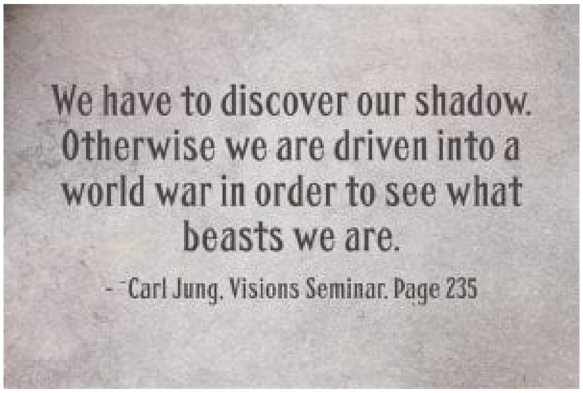
The fact is that if one tries beyond one's capacity to be perfect, the shadow descends into hell and becomes the devil.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 569



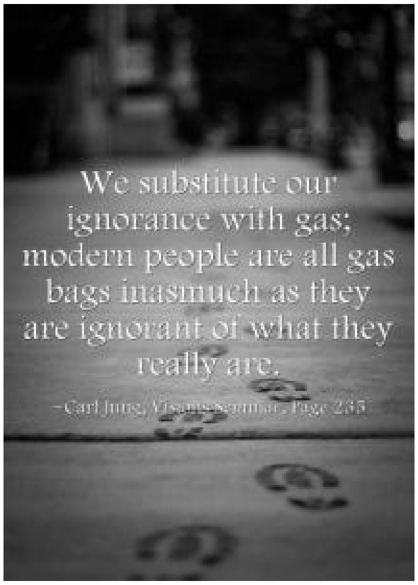
To be fully aware of the shadow would be an almost superhuman task, but we can reach a certain optimum of consciousness; we should be aware to a much higher degree than we are now.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 237



We have to discover our shadow. Otherwise we are driven into a world war in order to see what beasts we are.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 235



We substitute our ignorance with gas; modern people are all gas bags inasmuch as they are ignorant of what they really are.

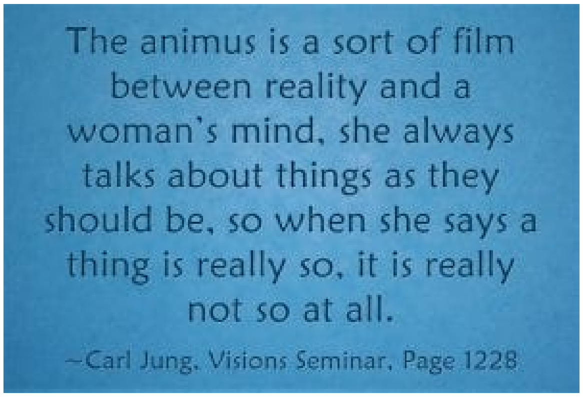
The animus is not created by the conscious, it is a creation of the unconscious, and therefore it is a personification of the unconscious.

~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 208



The animus is a sort of film between reality and a woman's mind, she always talks about things as they should be, so when she says a thing is really so, it is really not so at all.

The animus when on his way, on his quest, is really a psychopompos, leading the soul back to the stars whence it came.

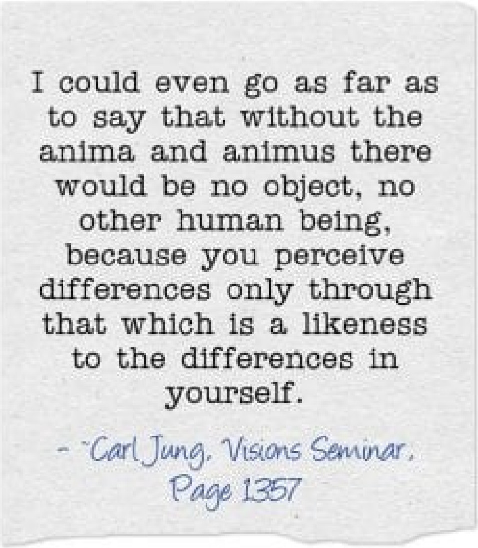
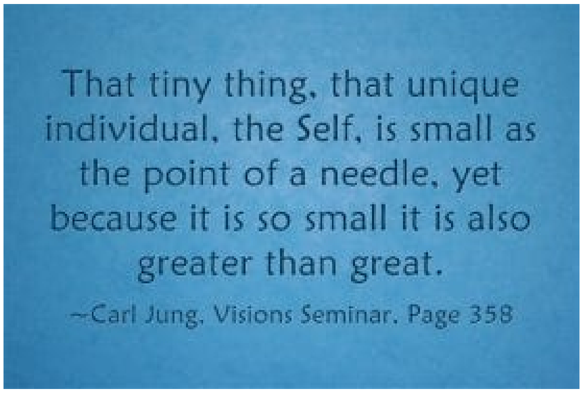
On the way back out of the existence in the flesh, the psychopompos [Animus] develops such a cosmic aspect, he wanders among the constellations, he leads the soul over the rainbow bridge into the blossoming fields of the stars.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 1229



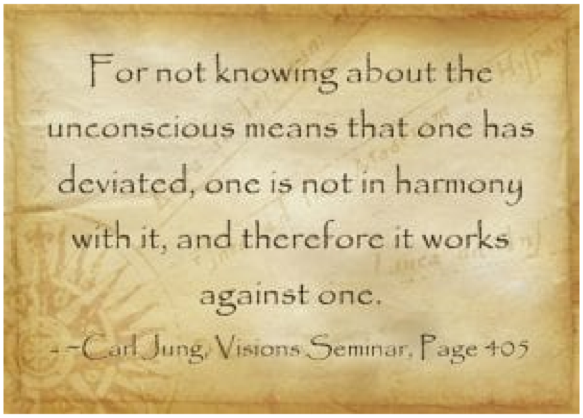
I could even go as far as to say that without the anima and animus there would be no object, no other human being, because you perceive differences only through that which is a likeness to the differences in yourself.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 1357



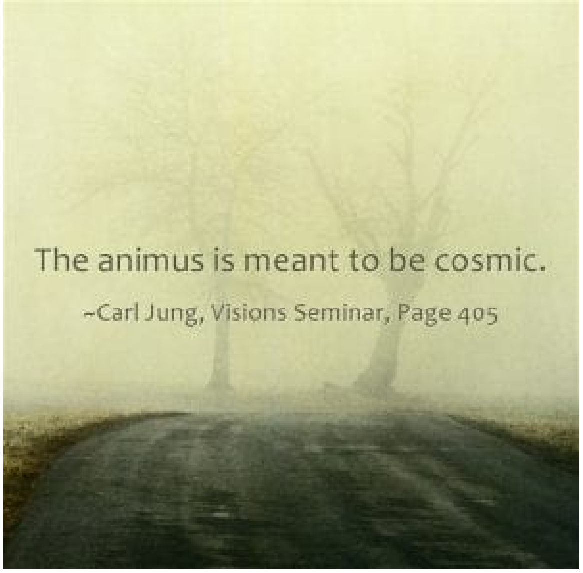
That tiny thing, that unique individual, the Self, is small as the point of a needle, yet because it is so small it is also greater than great.

~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 358



For not knowing about the unconscious means that one has deviated, one is not in harmony with it, and therefore it works against one.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 405



The animus is meant to be cosmic.

Is there any more beautiful love story than the love story of Mary? Wonderfully secret, divine, it is the only love affair of God that we know about.

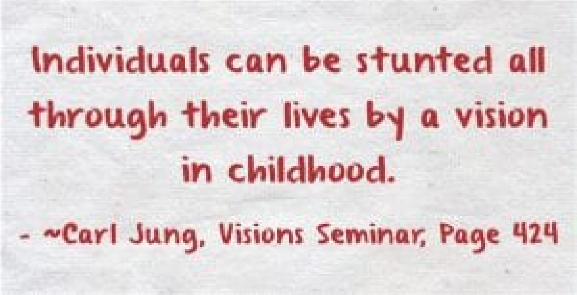
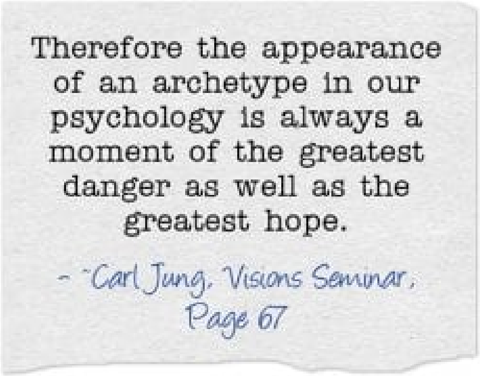
They [Children's Dreams] must come from the psychology of the collective unconscious; one could say they were remnants of things they had seen before they were born, and that is really vision.

~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 424



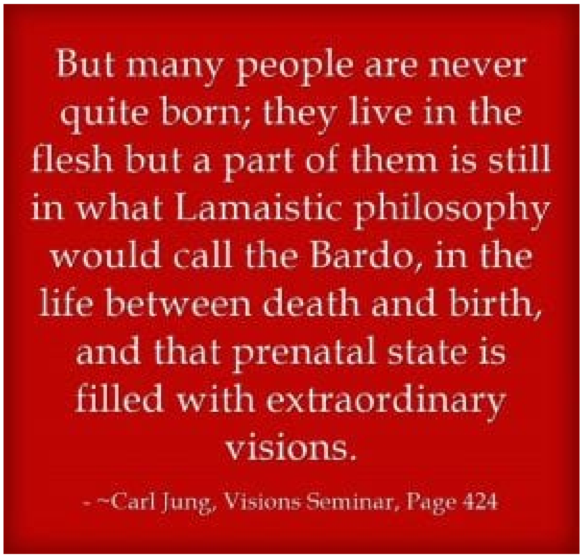
Individuals can be stunted all through their lives by a vision in childhood.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 424



Therefore the appearance of an archetype in our psychology is always a moment of the greatest danger as well as the greatest hope.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 67



But many people are never quite born; they live in the flesh but a part of them is still in what Lamaistic philosophy would call the Bardo, in the life between death and birth, and that prenatal state is filled with extraordinary visions.

Carl Jung’s Letter regarding Tuberculosis [TB] (2019-06-26 04:40)

Dear Mr. Campbell:

Thank you so much for your kind letter and the programme of your conference. I fully realize that Catholic analysts are faced with very particular problems which, on the one hand, are an aggravation of the work which is difficult in itself already, yet on the other hand, am asset, since you start within a world of thought and feeling based upon archetypal realities.

I have had a number of TB patients in my time and some really excellent results with psychotherapy, but it is true that the average somatic case generally has a resistance to the psychological approach, particularly the TB patients, since TB is, in a way "pneumatic" disease, that is, affecting the life-giving breath. It is in such cases as these as if the patient had a pride and obstinacy in defending the achievement of a somatic answer to an insoluble psychological problem.

With every good wish for Christmas and the New Year, I remain,

Yours cordially, C.G. Jung [Letter dated December 19, 1952.]

Notes:

1. Paul Campbell was a Catholic analytical psychologist in Glasgow.
2. A tuberculosis specialist had referred several cases to Mr. Campbell believing in the value of analysis in effecting a cure.

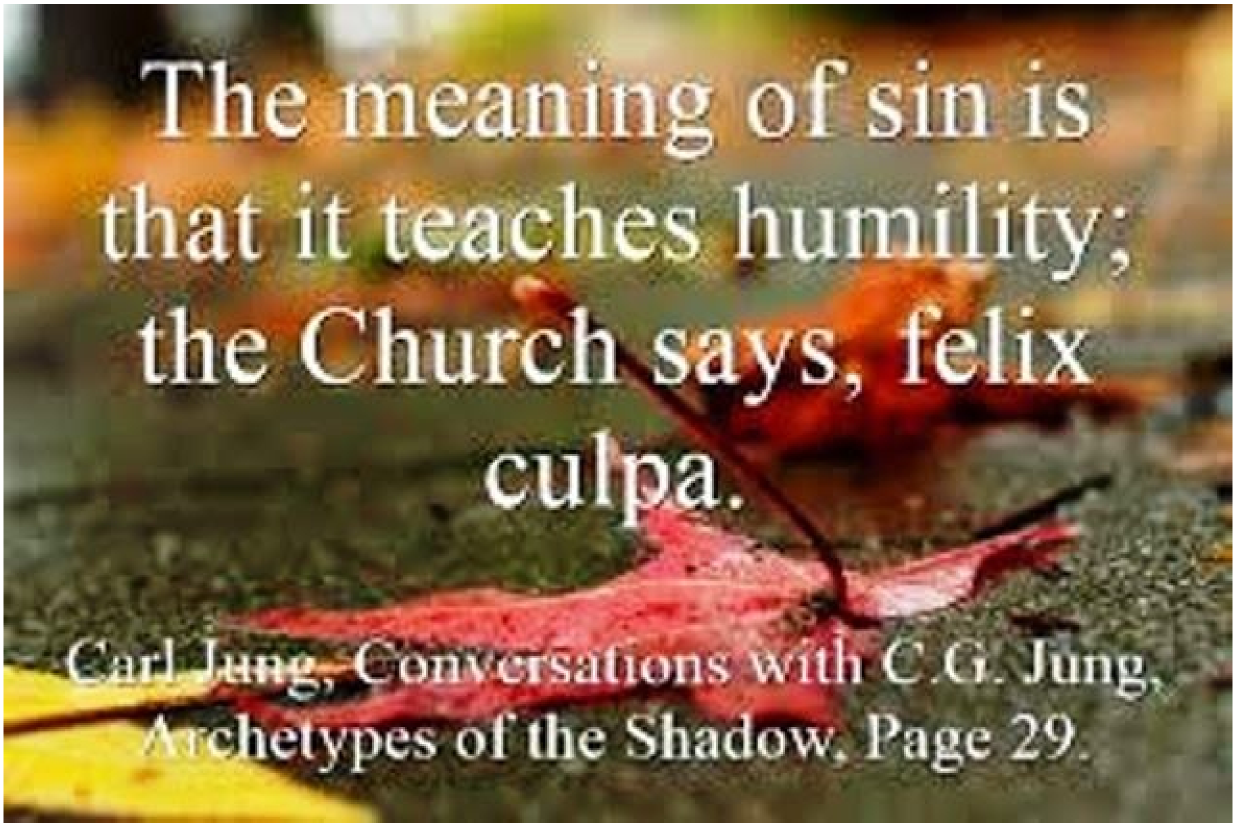
Is it not better to send the patient back to life to get his relationships there, rather than to continue analysis (2019-06-27 04:01)

[1]



The meaning of sin is that it teaches humility; the Church says, felix culpa.

Carl Jung, Conversations with C.G. Jung, Archetypes of the Shadow, Page 29.

Question. Is it not better to send the patient back to life to got his relationships there, rather than to continue analysis thus arousing the great dependence of the transference?

Answer. The patient should go back to life as soon as possible; he should form relationships outside of analysis as soon as possible. A patient who cannot do this is called a severe or difficult case, for it threatens to be long, and it may be a long time before the patient can form relationships outside; thus he will be dependent on the analyst for a long time.

The analyst is only too thankful to get rid of such cases, so that it cannot be said that the analyst stresses dependence as part of the transference.

Such dependence is something that happens, so that you cannot speak of It as something that ought not to be, rather you should say, "It could not be avoided."

It is much nicer not to experience transference, just as it is nicer not to experience life. If you want to go to heaven, your feet will grow into hell.

If it is at all possible, it is better not to take the patient out of his ordinary life and work. But in as far as the relations in life are morbid, they must be sacrificed for the analytical process. Where the relations to the family and so on are unconscious, they must be sacrificed, for this is the inherited sin.

It is more probable that the relations to the world may have to fall away in the one of the extrovert than in the case of the introvert where the relations are much scarcer. But such generalizations must not be taken as law. Carl Jung, Cornwall Seminar, Page 12

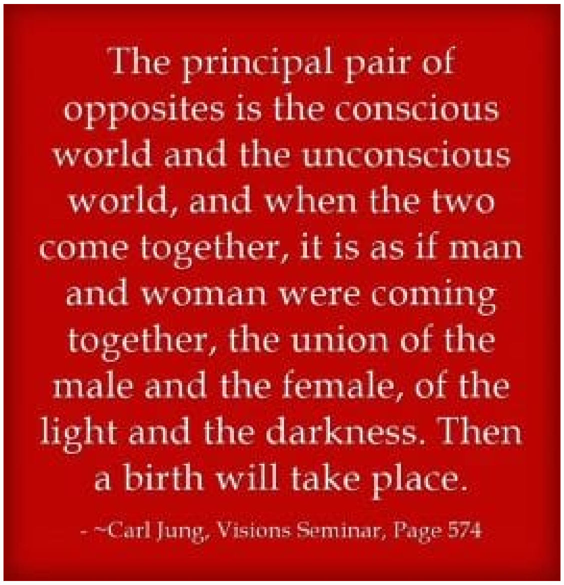
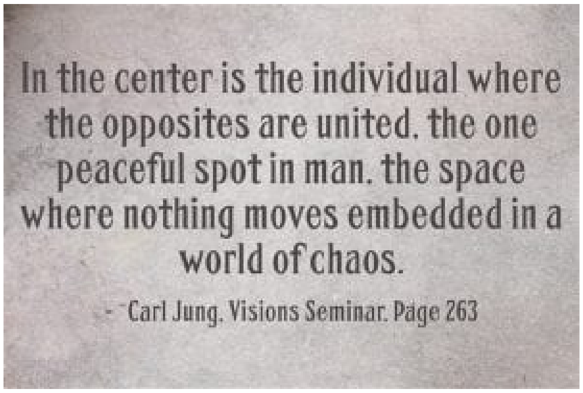
Some Carl Jung Quotations (2019-06-27 04:05)



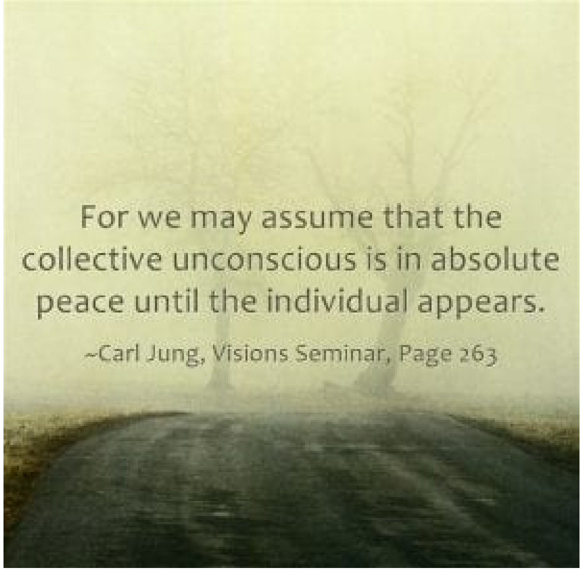
The principal pair of opposites is the conscious world and the unconscious world, and when the two come together, it is as if man and woman were coming together, the union of the male and the female, of the light and the darkness. Then a birth will take place.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 574



In the center is the individual where the opposites are united. the one peaceful spot in man. the space where nothing moves embedded in a world of chaos.

- ~Carl Jung. Visions Seminar. Page 263



For we may assume that the collective unconscious is in absolute peace until the individual appears.

The day comes when you are outgrown and then you are approaching the void, which seems to me to be the most desirable thing, the thing which contains the most meaning.

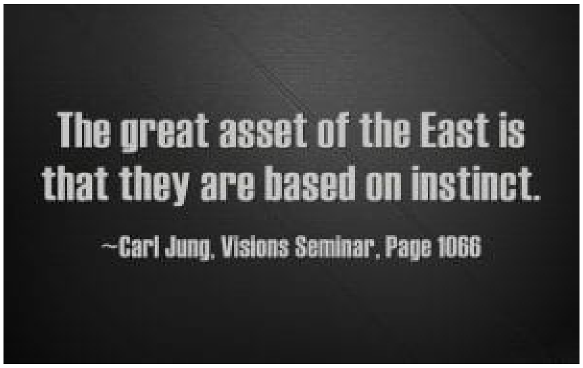
The Eastern philosophy is a sort of yoga, it is alive, it is an art, the art of making something of oneself.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 1024



The great asset of the East is that they are based on instinct.

It is also the Eastern idea that through understanding one finds the roots of suffering.

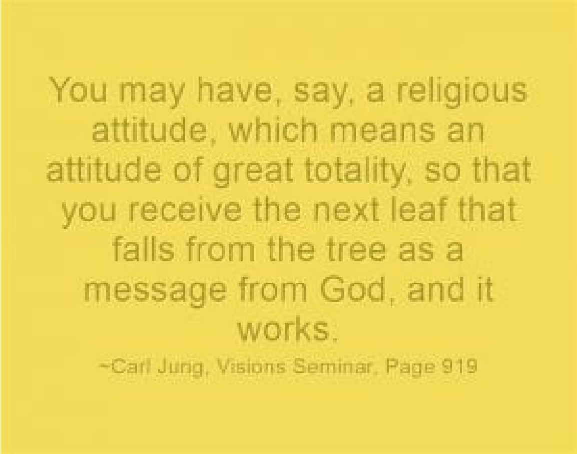
The religious attitude, it is quite different, and above all it is not conscious. You can profess whatever you like consciously while your unconscious attitude is totally different.

~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 41



You may have, say, a religious attitude, which means an attitude of great totality, so that you receive the next leaf that falls from the tree as a message from God, and it works.

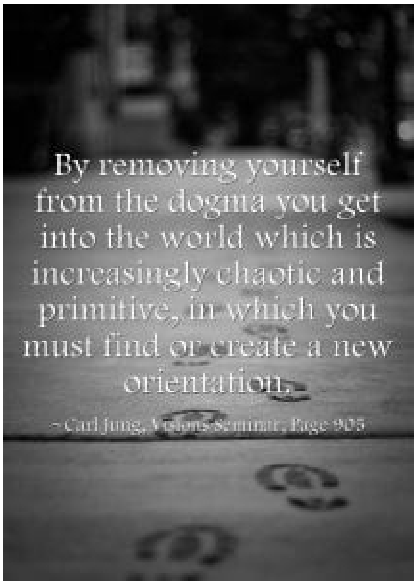
This symbolic process within us, or that need to express unknown, unknowable, inexpressible facts, culminates in religion. ~

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Pages 742-743



By removing yourself from the dogma you get into the world which is increasingly chaotic and primitive, in which you must find or create a new orientation.

It is tremendously important that people should be able to accept themselves; otherwise the will of God cannot be lived.

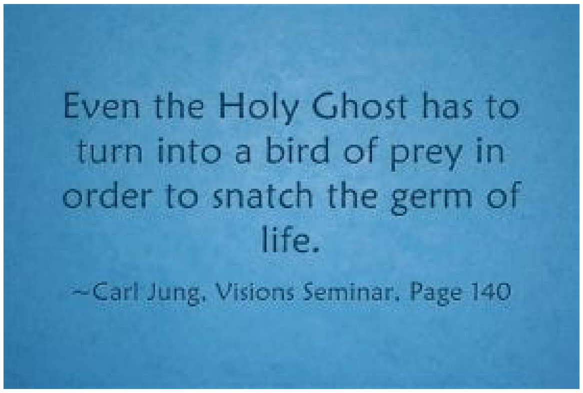
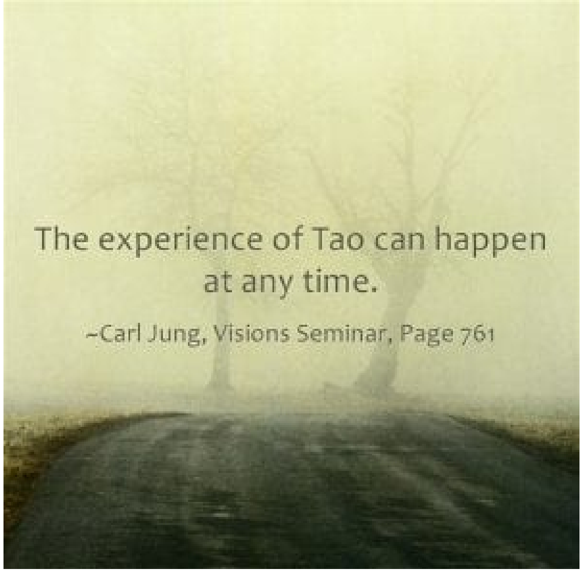
You cannot keep on the white side only. you have to admit that the spirit of life will at times take on the aspect of evil.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 140



Even the Holy Ghost has to turn into a bird of prey in order to snatch the germ of life.

~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 140



The experience of Tao can happen at any time.

The religious and moral and philosophical confusion, even the confusion in our art, is due to the World War.

When pairs of opposites appear together it is like fire and water; it either means an immediate crash, a tremendous catastrophe, or that they merely counteract one another.

For it is really true that if one creates a better relation to the unconscious, it proves to be a helpful power, it then has an activity of its own, it produces helpful dreams, and at times it really produces little miracles.

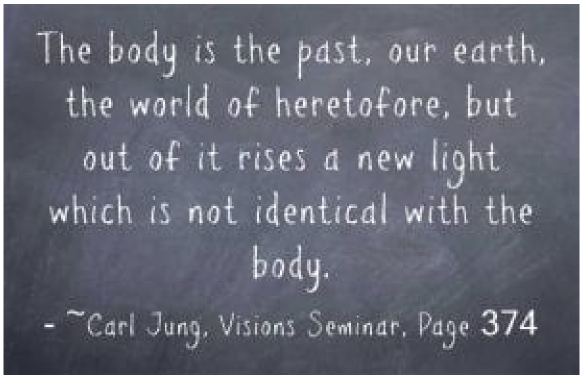
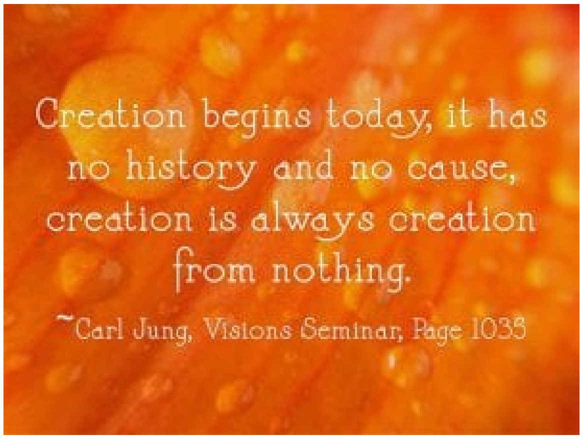
NOW TO BRING FORTH WHAT THE ORIGINAL WILL INTENDED IS REALLY THE TASK OF A WHOLE LIFETIME, A VERY SERIOUS UNDERTAKING.

– CARL JUNG, VISIONS SEMINAR, PAGE 391



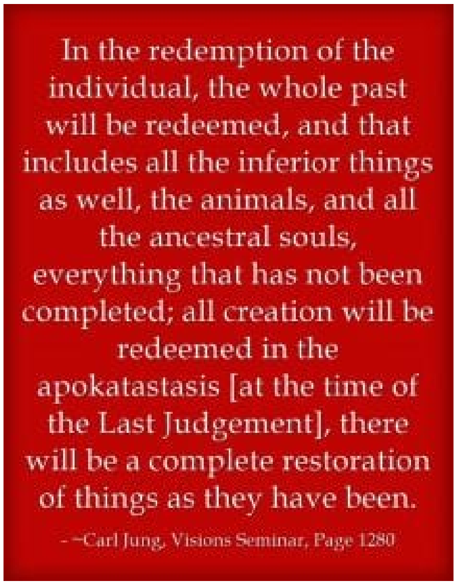
The body is the past, our earth, the world of heretofore, but out of it rises a new light which is not identical with the body.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 374



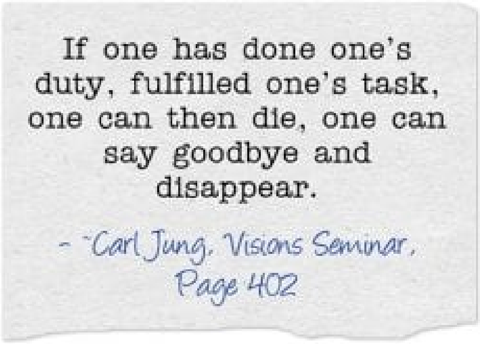
Creation begins today, it has no history and no cause, creation is always creation from nothing.

~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 1033



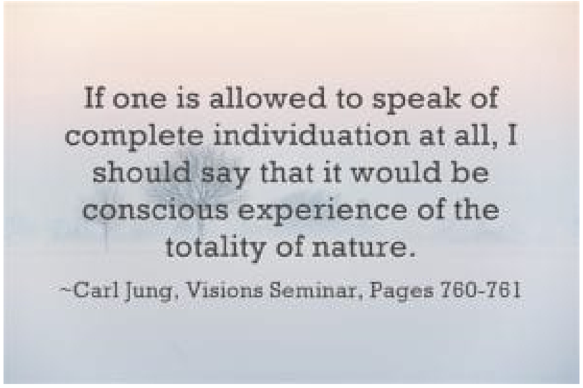
In the redemption of the individual, the whole past will be redeemed, and that includes all the inferior things as well, the animals, and all the ancestral souls, everything that has not been completed; all creation will be redeemed in the apokatastasis [at the time of the Last Judgement], there will be a complete restoration of things as they have been.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 1280



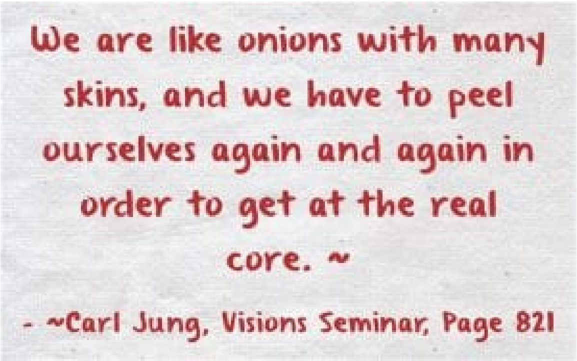
If one has done one's duty, fulfilled one's task, one can then die, one can say goodbye and disappear.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 402



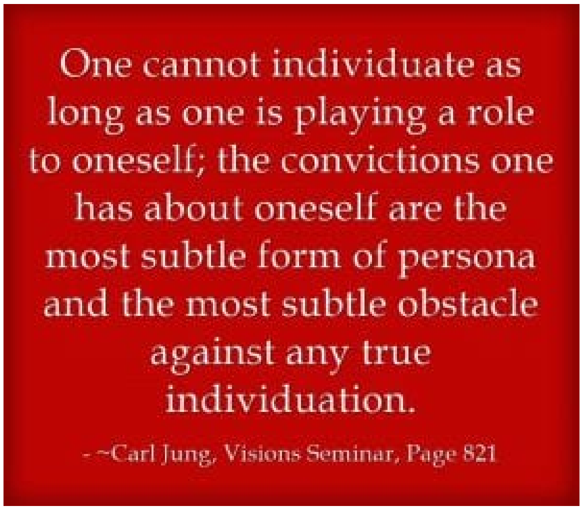
If one is allowed to speak of complete individuation at all, I should say that it would be conscious experience of the totality of nature.

~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Pages 760-761



We are like onions with many skins, and we have to peel ourselves again and again in order to get at the real core. ~

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 821



One cannot individuate as long as one is playing a role to oneself; the convictions one has about oneself are the most subtle form of persona and the most subtle obstacle against any true individuation.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 821

The principal pair of opposites is the conscious world and the unconscious world, and when the two come together, it is as if man and woman were coming together, the union of the male and the female, of the light and the darkness. Then a birth will take place. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 574

For we may assume that the collective unconscious is in absolute peace until the individual appears. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 263

Therefore individuation is a sin; it is an assertion of one particle against the gods, and when that happens even the world of the gods is upset, then there is turmoil. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 263

The day comes when you are outgrown and then you are approaching the void, which seems to me to be the most desirable thing, the thing which contains the most meaning. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 1026.

The Eastern philosophy is a sort of yoga, it is alive, it is an art, the art of making something of oneself. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 1024

The great asset of the East is that they are based on instinct. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 1066.

It is also the Eastern idea that through understanding one finds the roots of suffering. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 524.

The religious attitude, it is quite different, and above all it is not conscious. You can profess whatever you like consciously while your unconscious attitude is totally different. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 41

You may have, say, a religious attitude, which means an attitude of great totality, so that you receive the next leaf that falls from the tree as a message from God, and it works. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 919.

This symbolic process within us, or that need to express unknown, unknowable, inexpressible facts, culminates in religion. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Pages 742-743

By removing yourself from the dogma you get into the world which is increasingly chaotic and primitive, in which you must find or create a new orientation. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 905

It is tremendously important that people should be able to accept themselves; otherwise the will of God cannot be lived. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 391.

You cannot keep on the white side only, you have to admit that the spirit of life will at times take on the aspect of evil. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 140

Even the Holy Ghost has to turn into a bird of prey in order to snatch the germ of life. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 140

The experience of Tao can happen at any time. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 761

The religious and moral and philosophical confusion, even the confusion in our art, is due to the World War. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 77

When pairs of opposites appear together it is like fire and water; it either means an immediate crash, a tremendous catastrophe, or that they merely counteract one another. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 647

For it is really true that if one creates a better relation to the unconscious, it proves to be a helpful power, it then has an activity of its own, it produces helpful dreams, and at times it really produces little miracles. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 604

Now to bring forth what the original will intended is really the task of a whole lifetime, a very serious undertaking. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 391.

The body is the past, our earth, the world of heretofore, but out of it rises a new light which is not identical with the body. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 374

Creation begins today, it has no history and no cause, creation is always creation from nothing. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 1035

In the redemption of the individual, the whole past will be redeemed, and that includes all the inferior things as well, the animals, and all the ancestral souls, everything that has not been completed; all creation will be redeemed in the apokatastasis [at the time of the Last Judgement], there will be a complete restoration of things as they have been. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 1280

If one has done one's duty, fulfilled one's task, one can then die, one can say goodbye and disappear. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 402

If one is allowed to speak of complete individuation at all, I should say that it would be conscious experience of the totality of nature. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Pages 760-761

We are like onions with many skins, and we have to peel ourselves again and again in order to get at the real core. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 821

One cannot individuate as long as one is playing a role to oneself; the convictions one has about oneself are the most subtle form of persona and the most subtle obstacle against any true individuation. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 821

Carl Jung on "LSD" and "Mescaline" (2019-06-27 04:10)

INSPIRED BY NANCY
JUST SAY MEW TO CATNIP

Is the LSD-drug mescalin? It has indeed very curious effects— vide Aldous Huxley —of which I know far too little.

I don't know either what its psychotherapeutic value with neurotic or psychotic patients is.

I only know there is no point in wishing to know more of the collective unconscious than one gets through dreams and intuition.

The more you know of it, the greater and heavier becomes our moral burden, because the unconscious contents transform themselves into your individual tasks and duties as soon as they begin to become conscious.

Do you want to increase loneliness and misunderstanding?

Do you want to find more and more complications and increasing responsibilities?

You get enough of it.

If I once could say that I had done everything I know I had to do, then perhaps I should realize a legitimate need to take mescalin.

But if I should take it now, I would not be sure at all that I had not taken it out of idle curiosity.

I should hate the thought that I had touched on the sphere where the paint is made that colours the world, where the light is created that makes shine the splendour of the dawn, the lines and shapes of all form, the sound that fills the orbit, the thought that illuminates the darkness of the void.

There are some poor impoverished creatures, perhaps, for whom mescalin would be a heaven-sent gift without a counterpoison, but I am profoundly mistrustful of the "pure gifts of the Gods."

You pay very dearly for them. Quidquid id est, timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.

This is not the point at all, to know of or about the unconscious, nor does the story end here; on the contrary it is how and where you begin the real quest. If you are too unconscious it is a great relief to know a bit of the collective unconscious.

But it soon becomes dangerous to know more, because one does not learn at the same time how to balance it through a conscious equivalent.

That is the mistake Aldous Huxley makes: he does not know that he is in the role of the "Zauberlehrling," who learned from his master how to call the ghosts but did not know how to get rid of them again:

It is really the mistake of our age. We think it is enough to discover new things, but we don't realize that knowing more demands a cor¬responding development of morality.

Radioactive clouds over Japan, Calcutta, and Saskatchewan point to progressive poisoning of the uni¬versal atmosphere.

I should indeed be obliged to you if you could let me see the material they get with LSD. It is quite awful that the alienists have caught hold of a new poison to play with, without the faintest knowledge or feeling of responsibility.

It is just as if a surgeon had never leaned further than to cut open his patient's belly and to leave things there. When one gets to know unconscious contents one should know how to deal with them.

I can only hope that the doctors will feed themselves thoroughly with mescaline, the alkaloid of divine grace, so that they learn for themselves its marvellous effect.

You have not finished with the conscious side yet.

Why should you expect more from the unconscious?

For 35 years I have known enough of the collective unconscious and my whole effort is concentrated upon prepar¬ing the ways and means to deal with it. Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II to Victor White dated 10 April 1954 [excerpt]

Carl Jung: I make horoscopic calculations in order to find a clue to the core of psychological truth. (2019-06-27 09:34)

Dear Professor Freud, 12 June 1911

Since last writing to you (long enough, alas!)

I have made good use of my time.

I was at the Congress of Swiss Psychiatrists in Lausanne and spoke on "forms of unconscious fantasy."

These things are contributions to, and elaborations of, the work in the current Jahrbuch, which, incidentally, is taking shape terribly slowly (because of the wealth of material) .

Everything I am doing now revolves round the contents and forms of unconscious fantasies.

I think I've already got some really fine results.

You will see that this investigation is the necessary preliminary work for the psychology of Dem. praec. Spielrein's case is proof of that (it's in the Jahrbuch).

Often I longed for you to be here so that I could discuss an extremely difficult case:

Dem. praec. with, one can well say, a tremendous unconscious fantasy system which I have to drag into the light of day with unspeakable effort and patience.

On top of that, constant danger of suicide.

A really devilish case, but extraordinarily interesting and instructive.

The case is particularly painful because I am now beginning to see what I did not see with Honegger.

It seems that in Dem. praec. you have at all costs to bring to light the inner world produced by the introversion of libido, which in paranoiacs suddenly appears in distorted form as a delusional system (Schreber), as I have apparently succeeded in doing in the present case but failed to do with Honegger because I had no inkling of it.

I tell myself that this lack of knowledge of mine led to his death. What if this view should be confirmed?

I have the feeling I am practising vivisection on human beings with intense inner resistance.

It seems that introversion leads not only, as in hysteria, to a recrudescence of infantile memories but also to a loosening up of the historical layers of the unconscious, thus giving rise to perilous formations which come to light only in exceptional cases.

My evenings are taken up very largely with astrology.

I make horoscopic calculations in order to find a clue to the core of psychological truth.

Some remarkable things have turned up which will certainly appear incredible to you.

In the case of one lady, the calculation of the position of the stars at her nativity produced a quite definite character picture, with several biographical details which did not belong to her but to her mother-and the characteristics fitted the mother to a T.

The lady suffers from an extraordinary mother complex.

I dare say that we shall one day discover in astrology a good deal of knowledge that has been intuitively projected into the heavens.

For instance, it appears that the signs of the zodiac are character pictures, in other words libido symbols which depict the typical qualities of the libido at a given moment.

I still haven’t finished my popular exposition for the Zurich Jahrbuch.

This week I must start work on my Brussels lecture.

With cordial greetings,

Very sincerely,

JUNG Carl Jung, Freud/Jung Letters, Pages 23-24

All the tendrils that would not bear grapes..... (2019-06-28 04:00)

[1]

Carl Jung’s Letter to “N” interpreting her fantasy story:

Dear N:

As promised, I will try to sketch my “reaction”:

I was drawn into the ream which oneself is, and in which there is no I and no You anymore. It be He has to acquire it for himself because he begins with the great parents, the King and Queen, who own many forests, fields, meadows, and vineyards. Late in life someone find his inheritance, a tiny little bit of land, where he grows his vine and tree of life (vita = life, vinum = wine).

He as to acquire it for himself because he has been expelled from paradise and has nothing more, or rather, he has but doesn’t know it. It is walled round like a holy place. There he sees everything that has ever happened to him: sun and rain, heat and cold, sickness, wounds, tears and pain, but also fruitfulness and increase, sweetness and drunkenness, and there with access to the All, the Whole.

Though he doesn’t know it, somebody else is there, an old man who knows but doesn’t tell. When one has looked and labored for a long time, one knows oneself and has grown old. The “secret of life” is my life, which is enacted round about by me, my life and my death; for when the vine has grown old it is torn up by the roots.

All the tendrils that would not bear grapes are pruned away. Its life is remorselessly cut down to its essence, and the sweetness of the grape is turned into wine, dry and heady, a son of the earth who serves his blood to the multitude and causes the drunkenness which unites the divided and brings back the memory of possessing all and of the kingship, a time of loosening, and a time of peace.

There is much more to follow, but it can no longer be told.

Ever yours, C.G. [Letter dated August 1959]

Note: “N” had requested Dr. Jung to paraphrase a fantasy story she had sent her about a vine shoot.

Carl Jung and The connection with the brain does not in itself prove that the psyche is an epiphenomenon... (2019-06-28 04:23)

[1]

There is no consciousness without discrimination of opposites.
– CG Jung, CW 9i, par. 178
FrithLuton.com

The connection with the brain does not in itself prove that the psyche is an epiphenomenon, a secondary function causally dependent on biochemical processes.

Nevertheless, we know only too well how much the psychic function can be disturbed by verifiable processes in the brain, and this fact is so impressive that the subsidiary nature of the psyche seems an almost unavoidable inference.

The phenomena of parapsychology, however, warn us to be careful, for they point to a relativization of space and time through psychic factors which casts doubt on our naïve and overhasty explanation of the parallels between the psychic and the physical.

For the sake of this explanation people deny the findings of parapsychology outright, either for philosophical reasons or from intellectual laziness.

This can hardly be considered a scientifically responsible attitude, even though it is a popular way out of a quite extraordinary intellectual difficulty.

To assess the psychic phenomenon, we have to take account of all the other phenomena that come with it, and accordingly we can no longer practice any psychology that ignores the existence of the unconscious or of parapsychology.

The structure and physiology of the brain furnish no explanation of the psychic process.

The psyche has a peculiar nature which cannot be reduced to anything else.

Like physiology, it represents a relatively self-contained field of experience to which we must attribute a quite special importance because it holds within itself one of the two indispensable conditions for existence as such, namely, the phenomenon of consciousness.

Without consciousness there would, practically speaking, be no world, for the world exists as such only in so far as it is consciously reflected and consciously expressed by a psyche. Consciousness is a precondition of being.

Thus the psyche is endowed with the dignity of a cosmic principle, which philosophically and in fact gives it a position coequal with the principle of physical being.

The carrier of this consciousness is the individual, who does not produce the psyche on his own volition but is, on the contrary, pre-formed by it and nourished by the gradual awakening of consciousness during childhood.

If the psyche must be granted an overriding empirical importance, so also must the individual, who is the only immediate manifestation of the psyche.

This fact must be expressly emphasized for two reasons.

Firstly, the individual psyche, just because of its individuality, is an exception to the statistical rule and is therefore robbed of one of its main characteristics when subjected to the leveling influence of statistical evaluation.

Secondly, the Churches grant it validity only in so far as it acknowledges their dogmas – in other words, when it surrenders to a collective category.

In both cases the will to individuality is regarded as egotistic obstinacy.

Science devalues it as subjectivism, and the Churches condemn it morally as heresy and spiritual pride. Carl Jung, The Undiscovered Self.

Carl Jung on the "Risen One." (2019-06-28 04:28)

[1]

[Carl Jung on the "Risen One."]

I do not expect any believing Christian to pursue these thoughts of mine any further, for they will probably seem to him absurd.

I am not, however, addressing myself to the happy possessors of faith, but to those many people for whom the light has gone out, the mystery has faded, and God is dead.

For most of them there is no going back, and one does not know either whether going back is always the better way.

To gain an understanding of religious matters, probably all that is left us today is the psychological approach.

That is why I take these thought forms that have become historically fixed, try to melt them down again and pour them into molds of immediate experience.

It is certainly a difficult undertaking to discover connecting links between dogma and immediate experience of psychological archetypes, but a study of the natural symbols of the unconscious gives us the necessary raw material.

God’s death, or his disappearance, is by no means only a Christian symbol.

The search which follows the death is still repeated today after the death of a Dalai Lama, and in antiquity it was celebrated in the annual search for the Kore.

Such a wide distribution argues in favor of the universal occurrence of this typical psychic process: the highest value, which gives life and meaning, has got lost.

This is a typical experience that has been repeated many times, and its expression therefore occupies a central place in the Christian mystery.

The death or loss must always repeat itself: Christ always dies, and always he is born; for the psychic life of the archetype is timeless in comparison with our individual time-boundness.

According to what laws now one and now another aspect of the archetype enters into active manifestation, I do not know.
I only know–and here I am expressing what countless other people know–that the present is a time of God’s death and disappearance.

The myth says he was not to be found where his body was laid.

‘Body’ means the outward, visible form, the erstwhile but ephemeral setting for the highest value.

The myth further says that the value rose again in a miraculous manner, transformed. It looks like a miracle, for, when a value disappears, it always seems to be lost irretrievably.

So it is quite unexpected that it should come back.

The three days’ descent into hell during death describes the sinking of the vanished value into the unconscious, where, by conquering the power of darkness, it establishes a new order, and then rises up to heaven again, that is, attains supreme clarity of consciousness.

The fact that only a few people see the Risen One means that no small difficulties stand in the way of finding and recognizing the transformed value.” Carl Jung; Psychology and Religion; Pages 89-90

Carl Jung’s Letter to "N" on the Human Psyche and the Great Mother:

Dear N.,

I was very pleased to hear that you now have house and land of your own.

This is important for the chthonic powers.

I hope you will find time to commit your plant counterparts to the earth and tend their growth, tor the earth always wants children–houses, trees, flower–to grow out of her and celebrate the marriage of the human psyche with the Great Mother, the best counter-magic against rootless extraversion!

With best regards to you and your dear husband,

Life does not come from Events.............. (2019-06-28 07:50)

Life does not come from events, but from us. Everything that happens outside has already been.

Therefore whoever considers the event from outside always sees only that it already was, and that it is always the same. But whoever looks from inside, knows that everything is new. The events that happen are always the same. But the creative depths of man are not always the same. Events signify nothing, they signify only in us. We create the meaning of events. The meaning is and always was artificial. We make it.

Because of this we seek in ourselves the meaning of events, so that the way of what is to come becomes apparent and our life can flow again.

That which you need comes from yourself, namely the meaning of the event. The meaning of events is not their particular meaning. This meaning exists in learned books. Events have no meaning.

The meaning of events is the way of salvation that you create. The meaning of events comes from the possibility of life in this world that you create. It is the mastery of this world and the assertion of your soul in this world.

This meaning of events is the supreme meaning, that is not in events, and not in the soul, but is the God standing between events and the soul, the mediator of life, the way, the bridge and the going across. Carl Jung; Red Book

Carl Jung: Relating to Freud, Adler, and Rank (2019-06-28 09:59)

Carl Jung: Relating to Freud, Adler, and Rank

Dr. Evans: Dr. Jung, many of us who have read a great deal of your work are aware of the fact that in your early work you were in association with Dr. Sigmund Freud, and I know it would be of great interest to many of us to hear how you happened to hear of Dr. Freud and how you happened to become involved with some of his work and ideas.

Dr. Jung: Well, as a matter of fact, it was the year 1900, in December, soon after Freud's book about dream interpretation had come out, that I was asked by my chief, Professor Bleuler, to give a review of the book. I studied the book very attentively, and I did not understand many things in it, which were not clear to me at all; but from other parts I got the impression that this man really knew what he was talking about. I thought "this is certainly a masterpiece—full of future."

I had no ideas then of my own; I was just beginning. It was just when I began my career as assistant in the psychiatric clinic. And then I began with experimental psychology or psychopathology. I applied the experimental association methods of Wundt, the same that had been applied in the psychiatric clinic in Munich, and I studied the results and had the idea that one should go once more over it. So I made use of the association tests, and I found out that the important thing in them has been missed, because it is not interesting to see that there is a reaction—a certain reaction—to a stimulus word. That is more or less uninteresting. But the interesting thing is why people could not react to certain stimulus words, or only react in an entirely inadequate way.

Then I began to study these places in the experiment where the attention, or the capability of this person apparently began to waver or to disappear, and I soon found out that it was a matter of intimate personal affairs people were thinking of, or which were in them, even if they momentarily did not think of them when they were unconscious with other words; that the inhibition came from the unconscious and hindered the expression in speech. Then, in examining all these cases as carefully as possible, I saw that it was a matter of what Freud called repressions. I also saw what he meant by symbolization.

Dr. Evans: In other words, from your word association studies, some of the things in The Interpretation of Dreams began to fall into place.

Dr. Jung: Yes! And then I wrote a book about psychology of dementia praecox, as it was called then— now it is schizophrenia—and I sent the book to Freud, writing to him about my association experiments and how they confirmed his theory thus far. That is how my friendship with Freud began.

Dr. Evans: There were other individuals who also became interested in Dr. Freud's work, and one of them was Dr. Alfred Adler. As you remember Dr. Adler, what in your estimation led him to become interested in Dr. Freud's work?

Dr. Jung: He belonged; he was one of the young doctors that belonged to his surroundings there. There were about twenty young doctors who followed Freud there, who were—who had a sort of little society. Adler was one who happened to be there, and he learned— he studied Freud's psychology in that circle.

Dr. Evans: Another individual, of course, who joined this group was Otto Rank, and he, unlike yourself, Dr. Adler, and Dr. Freud was not a physician; did not have the Doctor of Medicine degree. Was this regarded by your group at the time as something unusual, to have someone become interested in these ideas who was not by training a physician?

Dr. Jung: Oh no! I have met many people who represented different faculties who were interested in psychology. All people who had to do with human beings were naturally interested; theologians, lawyers, pedagogues; they all had to do with the human mind and these people were naturally interested.

Dr. Evans: Then your group, including Freud, did not feel that this was exclusively an area of interest for the physician? This was something that might appeal to many?

Dr. Jung: Oh my, yes! Mind you, every patient you have gets interested in psychology .Nearly everyone thinks he is meant to be an analyst, inevitably. Carl Jung, Conversations with Carl Jung, Page 11.

[Carl Jung on “The Individual’s Understanding of Himself”]

It is astounding that man, the instigator, inventor and vehicle of all these developments, the originator of all judgments and decisions and the planner of the future, must make himself such a quantité négligeable.

The contradiction, the paradoxical evaluation of humanity by man himself, is in truth a matter for wonder, and one can only explain it as springing from an extraordinary uncertainty of judgment – in other words, man is an enigma to himself.

This is understandable, seeing that he lacks the means of comparison necessary for self-knowledge.

He knows how to distinguish himself from the other animals in point of anatomy and physiology, but as a conscious, reflecting being, gifted with speech, he lacks all criteria for self-judgment. He is on this planet a unique phenomenon which he cannot compare with anything else.

The possibility of comparison and hence of self-knowledge would arise only if he could establish relations with quasi-human mammals inhabiting other stars.

Until then man must continue to resemble a hermit who knows that in respect of comparative anatomy he has affinities with the anthropoids but, to judge by appearances, is extraordinarily different from his cousins in respect of his psyche.

It is just in this most important characteristic of his species that he cannot know himself and therefore remains a mystery to himself.

The differences of degree within his own species are of little significance compared with the possibilities of self-knowledge which would be occasioned by an encounter with a creature of similar structure but different origin.

Our psyche, which is primarily responsible for all the historical changes wrought by the hand of man on the face of this planet, remains an insoluble puzzle and an incomprehensible wonder, an object of abiding perplexity – a feature it shares with all Nature's secrets.

In regard to the latter we still have hope of making more discoveries and finding answers to the most difficult questions.

But in regard to the psyche and psychology there seems to be a curious hesitancy. Not only is it the youngest of the empirical sciences, but it has great difficulty in getting anywhere near its proper object.

In the same way that our misconception of the solar system had to be freed from prejudice by Copernicus, the most strenuous efforts of a well-nigh revolutionary nature were needed to free psychology, first from the spell of mythological ideas, and then from the prejudice that the psyche is, on the one hand, a mere epiphenomenon of a biochemical process in the brain or, on the other hand, a wholly unapproachable and recondite matter.

The connection with the brain does not in itself prove that the psyche is an epiphenomenon, a secondary function causally dependent on biochemical processes.

Nevertheless, we know only too well how much the psychic function can be disturbed by verifiable processes in the brain, and this fact is so impressive that the subsidiary nature of the psyche seems an almost unavoidable inference.

The phenomena of parapsychology, however, warn us to be careful, for they point to a relativization of space and time through psychic factors which casts doubt on our naïve and overhasty explanation of the parallels between the psychic and the physical.

For the sake of this explanation people deny the findings of parapsychology outright, either for philosophical reasons or from intellectual laziness.

This can hardly be considered a scientifically responsible attitude, even though it is a popular way out of a quite extraordinary intellectual difficulty.

that ignores the existence of the unconscious or of parapsychology.

The structure and physiology of the brain furnish no explanation of the psychic process.

The psyche has a peculiar nature which cannot be reduced to anything else. Like physiology, it represents a relatively self-contained field of experience to which we must attribute a quite special importance because it holds within itself one of the two indispensable conditions for existence as such, namely, the phenomenon of consciousness.

Without consciousness there would, practically speaking, be no world, for the world exists as such only in so far as it is consciously reflected and consciously expressed by a psyche. Consciousness is a precondition of being.

Thus the psyche is endowed with the dignity of a cosmic principle, which philosophically and in fact gives it a position coequal with the principle of physical being.

The carrier of this consciousness is the individual, who does not produce the psyche on his own volition but is, on the contrary, pre-formed by it and nourished by the gradual awakening of consciousness during childhood.

If the psyche must be granted an overriding empirical importance, so also must the individual, who is the only immediate manifestation of the psyche.

This fact must be expressly emphasized for two reasons.

Firstly, the individual psyche, just because of its individuality, is an exception to the statistical rule and is therefore robbed of one of its main characteristics when subjected to the leveling influence of statistical evaluation.

Secondly, the Churches grant it validity only in so far as it acknowledges their dogmas – in other words, when it surrenders to a collective category.

In both cases the will to individuality is regarded as egotistic obstinacy.

Science devalues it as subjectivism, and the Churches condemn it morally as heresy and spiritual pride.

As to the latter charge, it should not be forgotten that, unlike other religions, Christianity holds at its core a symbol which has for its content the individual way of life of a man, the Son of Man, and that it even regards this individuation process as the incarnation and revelation of God himself.

Hence the development of the self acquires a significance whose full implications have hardly begun to be appreciated, because too much attention to externals blocks the way to immediate inner experience.

Were not the autonomy of the individual the secret longing of many people, this hard-pressed phenomenon would scarcely be able to survive the collective suppression either morally or spiritually.

All these obstacles make it more difficult to arrive at a correct appreciation of the human psyche, but they count for very little beside one other remarkable fact that deserves mentioning.

This is the common psychiatric experience that the devaluation of the psyche and other resistances to psychological enlightenment are based in large measure on fear – on panic fear of the discoveries that might be made in the realm of the unconscious.

These fears are found not only among persons who are frightened by the picture Freud painted of the unconscious; they also troubled the originator of psychoanalysis himself, who confessed to me that it was necessary to make a dogma of his sexual theory because this was the sole bulwark of reason against a possible “outburst of the black flood of occultism.”

In these words Freud was expressing his conviction that the unconscious still harbored many things that might lend themselves to “occult” interpretations, as is in fact the case.

These “archaic vestiges,” or archetypal forms grounded on the instincts and giving expression to them, have a numinous quality that sometimes arouses fear.

They are ineradicable, for they represent the ultimate foundations of the psyche itself.

They cannot be grasped intellectually, and when one has destroyed one manifestation of them, they reappear in altered form.

It is this fear of the unconscious psyche which not only impedes self-knowledge but is the gravest obstacle to a wider understanding and knowledge of psychology.

Often the fear is so great that one dares not admit it even to oneself. Here is a question that every religious person should consider very seriously; he might get an illuminating answer.

A scientifically oriented psychology is bound to proceed abstractly; that is, it removes itself just sufficiently far from its object not to lose sight of it altogether.

That is why the findings of laboratory psychology are, for all practical purposes, often so remarkably unenlightening and devoid of interest.

The more the individual object dominates the field of vision, the more practical, detailed and alive will be the knowledge derived from it.

This means that the objects of investigation, too, become more and more complicated and the uncertainty of individual factors increases proportionally to their number, thus increasing the possibility of error.

Understandably enough, academic psychology is scared of this risk and prefers to avoid complex impunity.

It has full freedom in the choice of questions it will put to Nature.

Medical psychology is very far from being in this more or less enviable position. Here the object puts the question and not the experimenter.

The doctor is confronted with facts which are not of his choosing and which he probably never would choose if he were a free agent.

It is the sickness or the patient that puts the crucial questions – in other words, Nature experiments with the doctor in expecting an answer from him.

The uniqueness of the individual and of his situation stares the doctor in the face and demands an answer.

His duty as a physician forces him to cope with a situation swarming with uncertainty factors. At first he will apply principles based on general experience, but he will soon realize that principles of this kind do not adequately express the facts and fail to meet the nature of the case.

The deeper his understanding penetrates, the more the general principles lose their meaning. But these principles are the foundation of objective knowledge and the yardstick by which it is measured.

With the growth of what both patient and doctor feel to be "understanding," the situation becomes increasingly subjectivized.

What was an advantage to begin with threatens to turn into a dangerous disadvantage.

Subjectivation (in technical terms, transference and countertransference) creates isolation from the environment, a social limitation which neither party wishes for but which invariably sets in when understanding predominates and is no longer balanced by knowledge.

As understanding deepens, the further removed it becomes from knowledge. An ideal understanding would ultimately result in each party's unthinkingly going along with the other's experience – a state of uncritical passivity coupled with the most complete subjectivity and lack of social responsibility.

Understanding carried to such lengths is in any case impossible, for it would require the virtual identification of two different individuals.

Sooner or later the relationship reaches a point where one partner feels he is being forced to sacrifice his own individuality so that it may be assimilated by that of the other.

This inevitable consequence breaks the understanding, for understanding presupposes the integral preservation of the individuality of both partners.

It is therefore advisable to carry understanding only to the point where the balance between understanding and knowledge is reached, for understanding at all costs is injurious to both partners.

This problem arises whenever complex, individual situations have to be known and understood.

It is the specific task of psychology to provide just this knowledge and understanding.

It would also be the task of the confessor zealous in the cure of souls, were it not that his office inevitably obliges him to apply the yardstick of his denominational bias at the critical moment.

As a result, the individual's right to exist as such is cut short by a collective prejudice and often curtailed in the most sensitive area.

The only time this does not happen is when the religious symbol, for instance the model life of Christ, is understood concretely and felt by the individual to be adequate.

How far this is the case today I would prefer to leave to the judgment of others.

At all events, the doctor very often has to treat patients to whom denominational limitations mean little or nothing.

His profession therefore compels him to have as few preconceptions as possible.

Similarly, while respecting metaphysical (i.e., non-verifiable) convictions and assertions, he will take care not to credit them with universal validity.

This caution is called for because individual traits of personality ought not to be twisted out of shape by arbitrary interventions from outside.

The doctor must leave this to environmental influences, to the person’s own inner development, and – in the widest sense – to fate with its wise or unwise decrees.

Many people will perhaps find this heightened caution exaggerated.

In view of the fact, however, that there is in any case such a multitude of reciprocal influences at work in the dialectical process between two individuals, even if this process is conducted with the most tactful reserve, the responsible doctor will refrain from adding unnecessarily to the collective factors to which his patient has already succumbed.

Moreover, he knows very well that the preaching of even the worthiest precepts only provokes the patient into open hostility or a secret resistance and thus needlessly endangers the aim of the treatment.

The psychic situation of the individual is so menaced nowadays by advertisement, propaganda and other more or less well-meant advice and suggestions that for once in his life the patient might be offered a relationship that does not repeat the nauseating “you should,” “you must” and similar confessions of impotence.

Against the onslaught from outside no less than against its repercussions in the psyche of the individual the doctor sees himself obliged to play the role of counsel for the defense.

Fear that anarchic instincts will thereby be let loose is a possibility that is greatly exaggerated, seeing that obvious safeguards exist within and without.

Above all, there is the natural cowardice of most men to be reckoned with, not to mention morality, good taste and – last but not least – the penal code.

This fear is nothing compared with the enormous effort it usually costs people to help the first stirrings of individuality into consciousness, let alone put them into effect.

And where these individual impulses have broken through too impetuously and unthinkingly, the doctor must protect them from the patient’s own clumsy recourse to shortsightedness, ruthlessness and cynicism.

As the dialectical discussion proceeds, a point is reached where an evaluation of these individual impulses becomes necessary.

By that time the patient should have acquired enough certainty of judgment to enable him to act on his own insight and decision and not from the mere wish to copy convention – even if he happens to agree with collective opinion.

Unless he stands firmly on his own feet, the so-called objective values profit him nothing, since they then only serve as a substitute for character and so help to suppress his individuality.

Naturally, society has an indisputable right to protect itself against arrant subjectivisms, but, in so far as society itself is composed of de-individualized persons, it is completely at the mercy of ruthless individualists.

Let it band together into groups and organizations as much as it likes – it is just this banding together and the resultant extinction of the individual personality that makes it succumb so readily to a dictator.

A million zeros joined together do not, unfortunately, add up to one. Ultimately everything depends on the quality of the individual, but the fatally shortsighted habit of our age is to think only in terms of large numbers and mass organizations, though one would think that the world had seen more than enough of what a well-disciplined mob can do in the hands of a single madman.

Unfortunately, this realization does not seem to have penetrated very far our blindness in this respect is extremely dangerous.

People go on blithely organizing and believing in the sovereign remedy of mass action, without the least consciousness of the fact that the most powerful organizations can be maintained only by the greatest ruthlessness of their leaders and the cheapest of slogans.

Curiously enough, the Churches too want to avail themselves of mass action in order to cast out the devil with Beelzebub – the very Churches whose care is the salvation of the individual soul.

They too do not appear to have heard anything of the elementary axiom of mass psychology, that the individual becomes morally and spiritually inferior in the mass, and for this reason they do not burden themselves overmuch with their real task of helping the individual to achieve a metanoia, or rebirth of the spirit – deo concedente.

It is, unfortunately, only too clear that if the individual is not truly regenerated in spirit, society cannot be either, for society is the sum total of individuals in need of redemption.

I can therefore see it only as a delusion when the Churches try – as they apparently do – to rope the individual into a social organization and reduce him to a condition of diminished responsibility, instead of raising him out of the torpid, mindless mass and making clear to him that he is the one important factor and that the salvation of the world consists in the salvation of the individual soul.

It is true that mass meetings parade such ideas before him and seek to impress them on him by dint of mass suggestion, with the unedifying result that when the intoxication has worn off, the mass man promptly succumbs to another even more obvious and still louder slogan.

His individual relation to God would be an effective shield against these pernicious influences. Did Christ ever call his disciples to him at a mass meeting?

Did the feeding of the five thousand bring him any followers who did not afterwards cry “Crucify him!” with the rest, when even the rock named Peter showed signs of wavering? And are not Jesus and Paul prototypes of those who, trusting their inner experience, have gone their own individual ways, disregarding public opinion?

This argument should certainly not cause us to overlook the reality of the situation confronting the Church.

When the Church tries to give shape to the amorphous mass by uniting individuals into a community of believers with the help of suggestion and tries to hold such an organization together, it is not only performing a great social service, but it also secures for the individual the inestimable boon of a meaningful life form.

These, however, are gifts which as a rule confirm certain tendencies and do not change them. As experience unfortunately shows, the inner man remains unchanged however much community he has. His environment cannot give him as a gift that which he can win for himself only with effort and suffering.

On the contrary, a favorable environment merely strengthens the dangerous tendency to expect everything to originate from outside – even that metamorphosis which external reality cannot provide, namely, a deep-seated change of the inner man, which is all the more urgent in view of the mass phenomena of today and the still greater problems of the increase of population looming up in the future.

It is time we asked ourselves exactly what we are lumping together in mass organizations and what constitutes the nature of the individual human being, i.e., of the real man and not the statistical man. This is hardly possible except through a new process of self-nourishment.

All mass movements, as one might expect, slip with the greatest ease down an inclined plane represented by large numbers.

Where the many are, there is security; what the many believe must of course be true; what the many want must be worth striving for, and necessary, and therefore good. In the clamor of the many there lies the power to snatch wish fulfillments by force; sweetest of all, however, is that gentle and painless slipping back into the kingdom of childhood, into the paradise of parental care, into happy-go-luckiness and irresponsibility.

All the thinking and looking after are done from the top; to all questions there is an answer; and for all needs the necessary provision is made.

The infantile dream state of the mass man is so unrealistic that he never thinks to ask who is paying for this paradise.

The balancing of accounts is left to a higher political or social authority, which welcomes the task, for its power is thereby increased; and the more power it has, the weaker and more helpless the individual becomes.

Wherever social conditions of this type develop on a large scale the road to tyranny lies open and the freedom of the individual turns into spiritual and physical slavery. Since every tyranny is ipso facto immoral and ruthless, it has much more freedom in the choice of its methods than an institution which still takes account of the individual.

Should such an institution come into conflict with the organized State, it is soon made aware of the very real disadvantage of its morality and therefore feels compelled to avail itself of the same methods as its opponent. In this way the evil spreads almost of necessity, even when direct infection might be avoided.

The danger of infection is greater where decisive importance is attached to large numbers and statistical values, as is everywhere the case in our Western world. The suffocating power of the masses is paraded before our eyes in one form or another every day in the newspapers, and the insignificance of the individual is rubbed into him so thoroughly that he loses all hope of making himself heard.

The outworn ideals of liberté, égalité, fraternité help him not at all, as he can direct this appeal only to his executioners, the spokesmen of the masses.

Resistance to the organized mass can be effected only by the man who is as well organized in his individuality as the mass itself. I fully realize that this proposition must sound well-nigh unintelligible to the man of today.

The helpful medieval view that man is a microcosm, a reflection of the great cosmos in miniature, has long since dropped away from him, although the very existence of his world-embracing and world-conditioning psyche might have taught him better.

Not only is the image of the macrocosm imprinted upon him as a psychic being, but he also creates this image for himself on an ever-widening scale.

He bears this cosmic "correspondence" within him by virtue of his reflecting consciousness, on the one hand, and, on the other, thanks to the hereditary, archetypal nature of his instincts, which bind him to his environment.

But his instincts not only attach him to the macrocosm; they also, in a sense, tear him apart, because his desires pull him in different directions.

In this way he falls into continual conflict with himself and only very rarely succeeds in giving his life an undivided goal – for which, as a rule, he must pay very dearly by repressing other sides of his nature.

One often has to ask oneself in such cases whether this kind of one-sidedness is worth forcing at all, seeing that the natural state of the human psyche consists in a certain jostling together of its components and in the contradictoriness of their behavior – that is, in a certain degree of dissociation. Buddhism calls it attachment to the "ten thousand things."

Such a condition cries out for order and synthesis.

Just as the chaotic movements of the crowd, all ending in mutual frustration, are impelled in a definite direction by a dictatorial will, so the individual in his dissociated state needs a directing and ordering principle.

Ego-consciousness would like to let its own will play this role, but overlooks the existence of powerful unconscious factors which thwart its intentions. If it wants to reach the goal of synthesis, it must first get to know the nature of these factors.

It must experience them, or else it must possess a numinous symbol that expresses them and conduces to synthesis.

A religious symbol that comprehends and visibly represents what is seeking expression in modern man could probably do this; but our conception of the Christian symbol to date has certainly not been able to do so.

On the contrary, that frightful world split runs right through the domains of the "Christian" white man, and our Christian outlook on life has proved powerless to prevent the recrudescence of an archaic social order like communism.

This is not to say that Christianity is finished. I am, on the contrary, convinced that it is not Christianity, but our conception and interpretation of it, that has become antiquated in the face of the present world situation.

The Christian symbol is a living thing that carries in itself the seeds of further development. It can go on developing; it depends only on us, whether we can make up our minds to meditate again, and more thoroughly, on the Christian premises.

This requires a very different attitude towards the individual, towards the microcosm of the self, from the one we have had hitherto.

That is why nobody knows what ways of approach are open to man, what inner experiences he can still pass through and what psychic facts underlie the religious myth. Over this hangs so universal a darkness that no one can see why he should be interested or to what end he could commit himself. Before this problem we stand helpless.

This is not surprising, since practically all the trump cards are in the hands of our opponents.

They can appeal to the big battalions and their crushing power. Politics, science and technology stand ranged on their side.

The imposing arguments of science represent the highest degree of intellectual certainty yet achieved by the mind of man.

So at least it seems to the man of today, who has received hundred-fold enlightenment concerning the backwardness and darkness of past ages and their superstitions.

That his teachers have themselves gone seriously astray by making false comparisons between incommensurable factors never enters his head.

All the more so as the intellectual elite to whom he puts his questions are almost unanimously agreed that what science regards as impossible today was impossible at all other times as well.

Above all, the facts of faith, which might give him the chance of an extramundane standpoint, are treated in the same context as the facts of science.

Thus, when the individual questions the Churches and their spokesmen, to whom is entrusted the cure of souls, he is informed that membership in a creed – a decidedly worldly institution – is more or less de rigueur for religious belief; that the facts of faith which have become questionable for him were concrete historical events; that certain ritual actions produce miraculous effects; and that the sufferings of Christ have vicariously saved him from sin and its consequences (i.e., eternal damnation).

If, with the limited means at his disposal, he begins to reflect on these things, he will have to confess that he does not understand them at all and that only two possibilities are open to him: either to believe implicitly, or to reject such statements because they are flatly incomprehensible.

Whereas the man of today can easily think about and understand all the “truths” dished out to him by the State, his understanding of religion is made considerably more difficult owing to the lack of explanations. (“Do you understand what you are reading?”)

And he said, “How can I, unless someone guides me?” Acts 8:30.) If, despite this, he has still not discarded all his religious convictions, this is because the religious impulse rests on an instinctive basis and is therefore a specifically human function. You can take away a man’s gods, but only to give him others in return.

The leaders of the mass State cannot avoid being deified, and wherever crudities of this kind have not yet been put over by force, obsessive factors arise in their stead, charged with demonic energy – for instance, money, work, political influence, and so forth.

When any natural human function gets lost, i.e., is denied conscious and intentional expression, a general disturbance results.

Hence, it is quite natural that with the triumph of the Goddess of Reason a general neuroticizing of modern man should set in, a dissociation of personality analogous to the splitting of the world today by the Iron Curtain.

This boundary line bristling with barbed wire runs through the psyche of modern man, no matter on which side he lives. And just as the typical neurotic is unconscious of his shadow side, so the normal individual, like the neurotic, sees his shadow in his neighbor or in the man beyond the great divide.

It has even become a political and social duty to apostrophize the capitalism of the one and the communism of the other as the very devil, so as to fascinate the outward eye and prevent it from looking at the individual life within.

But just as the neurotic, despite unconsciousness of his other side, has a dim premonition that all is not well with his psychic economy, so Western man has developed an instinctive interest in his psyche and in "psychology."

Thus it is that the doctor is summoned willy-nilly to appear on the world stage, and questions are addressed to him which primarily concern the most intimate and hidden life of the individual, but which in the last analysis are the direct effects of the Zeitgeist.

Because of its personal symptomatology this material is usually considered to be "neurotic" – and rightly so, since it is made up of infantile fantasies which ill accord with the contents of an adult psyche and are therefore repressed by our moral judgment, in so far as they reach consciousness at all.

Most fantasies of this kind do not, in the nature of things, come to consciousness in infantile form, and it is very improbable, to say the least of it, that they were ever conscious and were consciously repressed.

Rather, they seem to have been present always, or, at any rate, to have arisen unconsciously and to have persisted in this state until the psychologist's intervention enabled them to cross the threshold of consciousness.

The activation of unconscious fantasies is a process that occurs when consciousness finds itself in a critical situation.

Were that not so, the fantasies would be produced normally and would then be followed by the usual neurotic disturbances.

In reality, fantasies of this kind belong to the world of childhood and give rise to disturbances only when prematurely strengthened by abnormal conditions in the conscious life.

This is particularly likely to happen when unfavorable influences emanate from the parents, poisoning the atmosphere and producing conflicts which upset the psychic balance of the child.

When a neurosis breaks out in an adult, the fantasy world of childhood reappears, and one is tempted to explain the onset of the neurosis causally, as due to the presence of infantile fantasies. But that does not explain why the fantasies did not develop any pathological effects during the interim period.

These effects develop only when the individual comes up against a situation which he cannot overcome by conscious means.

The resultant standstill in the development of personality opens a sluice for infantile fantasies, which, of course, are latent in everybody but do not display any activity so long as the conscious personality can continue on its way unimpeded.

When the fantasies reach a certain level of intensity, they begin to break through into consciousness and create a conflict situation that becomes perceptible to the patient himself, splitting him into two personalities with different characters.

The dissociation, however, had been prepared long before in the unconscious, when the energy flowing off from consciousness (because unused) strengthened the negative qualities of the unconscious personality, and particularly its infantile traits.

Since the normal fantasies of a child are nothing other, at bottom, than the imagination born of the instinctive impulses, and may thus be regarded as preliminary exercises in the use of future conscious activities, it follows that the fantasies of the neurotic, even though pathologically altered and perhaps perverted by the regression of energy, contain a core of normal instinct, the hallmark of which is adaptedness.

A neurotic illness always implies an unadapted alteration and distortion of normal dynamisms and of the "imagination" proper to them.

Instincts, however, are highly conservative and of extreme antiquity as regards both their dynamism and their form.

Their form, when represented to the mind, appears as an image which expresses the nature of the instinctive impulse visually and concretely, like a picture.

If we could look into the psyche of the yucca moth, for instance, we would find in it a pattern of ideas, of a numinous or fascinating character, which not only compel the moth to carry out its fertilizing activity on the yucca plant, but help it to "recognize" the total situation.

Instinct is anything but a blind and indefinite impulse, since it proves to be attuned and adapted to a definite external situation.

This latter circumstance gives it its specific and irreducible form. Just as instinct is original and hereditary, so, too, its form is age-old, that is to say, archetypal. It is even older and more conservative than the body's form.

These biological considerations naturally apply also to Homo sapiens, who still remains within the framework of general biology despite the possession of consciousness, will and reason.

The fact that our conscious activity is rooted in instinct and derives from it its dynamism as well as the basic features of its ideational forms has the same significance for human psychology as for all other members of the animal kingdom.

Human knowledge consists essentially in the constant adaptation of the primordial patterns of ideas that were given us a priori.

These need certain modifications, because, in their original form, they are suited to an archaic mode of life but not to the demands of a specifically differentiated environment.

If the flow of instinctive dynamism into our life is to be maintained, as is absolutely necessary for our existence, then it is imperative that we remold these archetypal forms into ideas which are adequate to the challenge of the present. Some Carl Jung Quotations (2019-06-28 11:27)

We must read the Bible or we shall not understand psychology. Our psychology, whole lives, our language and imagery are built upon the Bible.

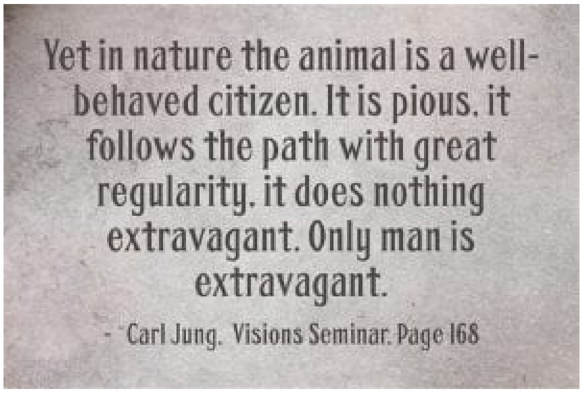
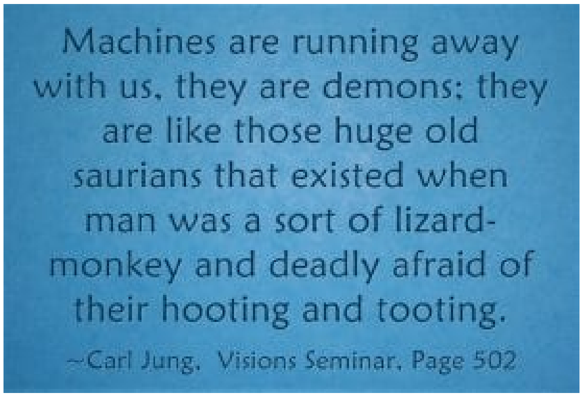
It is a general truth that the earth is depreciated and misunderstood…For quite long enough we have been taught that this life is not the real thing…and that we live only for heaven.

~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 193



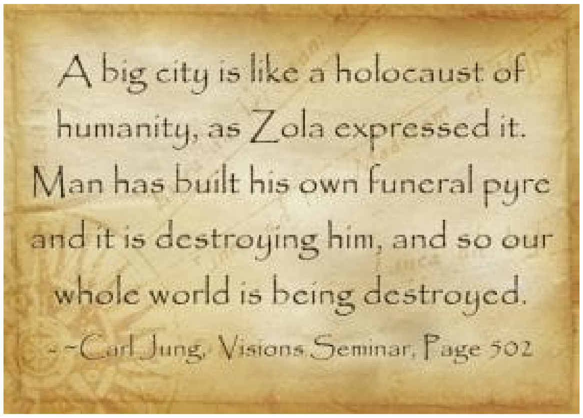
Yet in nature the animal is a well-behaved citizen. It is pious, it follows the path with great regularity, it does nothing extravagant. Only man is extravagant.

- Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 168



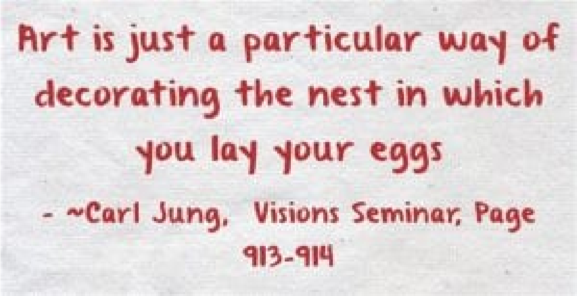
Machines are running away with us, they are demons; they are like those huge old saurians that existed when man was a sort of lizard-monkey and deadly afraid of their hooting and tooting.

~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 502



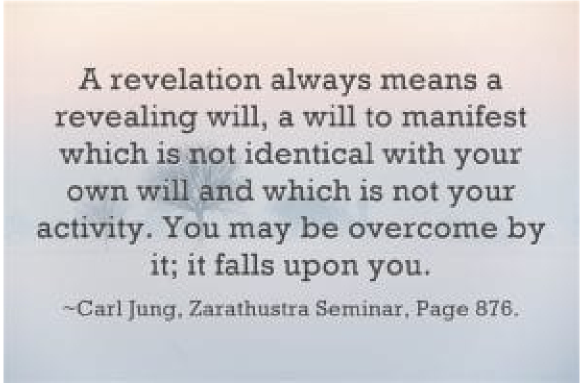
A big city is like a holocaust of humanity, as Zola expressed it. Man has built his own funeral pyre and it is destroying him, and so our whole world is being destroyed.

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 502



Art is just a particular way of decorating the nest in which you lay your eggs

- ~Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 913-914



A revelation always means a revealing will, a will to manifest which is not identical with your own will and which is not your activity. You may be overcome by it; it falls upon you.

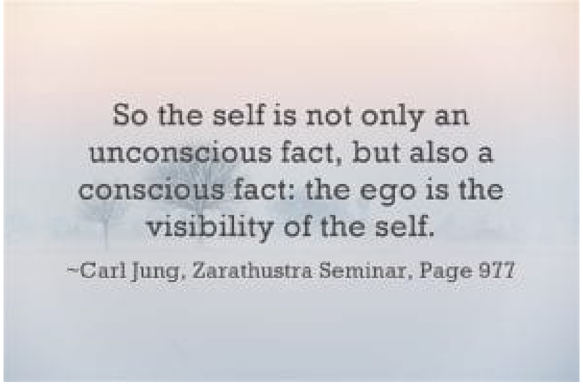
Every light, every fire, comes to an end, and there would be utter darkness, but there is still left the light of the self, which is the supreme light.

- ~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 792



So the self is not only an unconscious fact, but also a conscious fact: the ego is the visibility of the self.

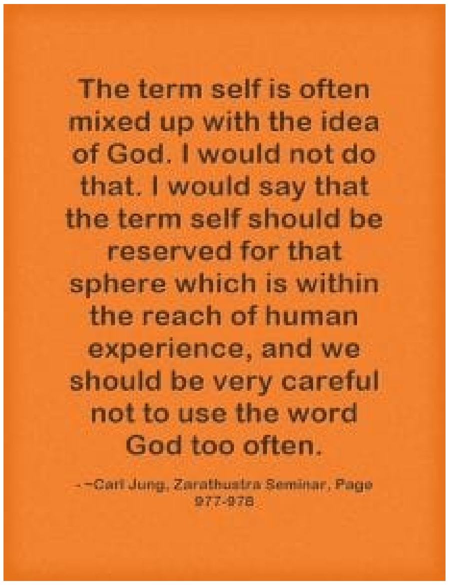
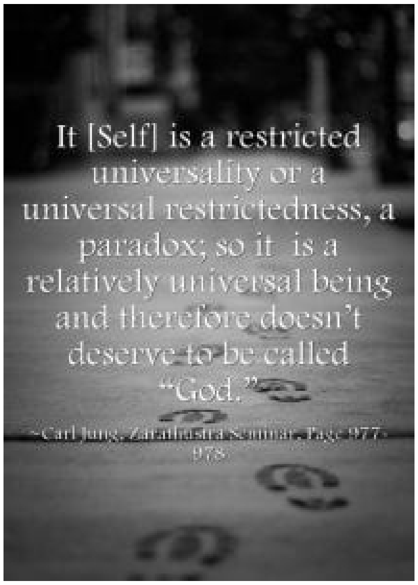
The self would be the preceding stage, a being that is more than man and that definitely manifests; that is the thinker of our thoughts, the doer of our deeds, the maker of our lives, yet it is still within the reach of human experience.

- ~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 977-978



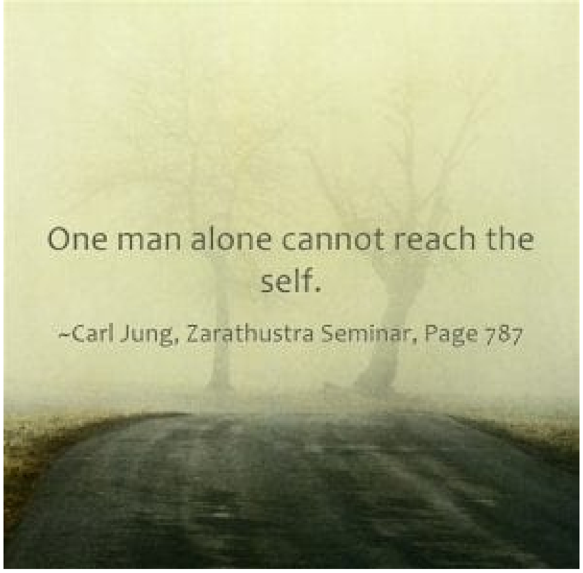
The term self is often mixed up with the idea of God. I would not do that. I would say that the term self should be reserved for that sphere which is within the reach of human experience, and we should be very careful not to use the word God too often.

- ~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 977-978



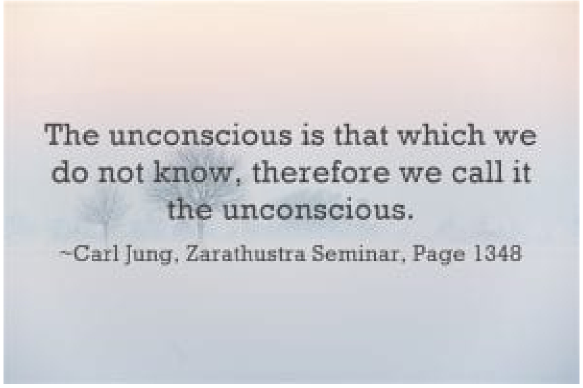
It [Self] is a restricted universality or a universal restrictedness, a paradox; so it is a relatively universal being and therefore doesn't deserve to be called "God."

~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 977-978



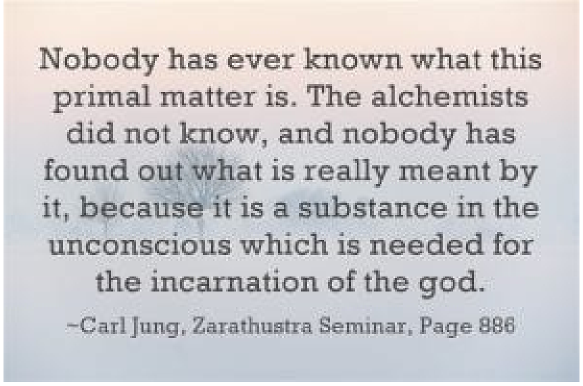
One man alone cannot reach the self.

~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 787



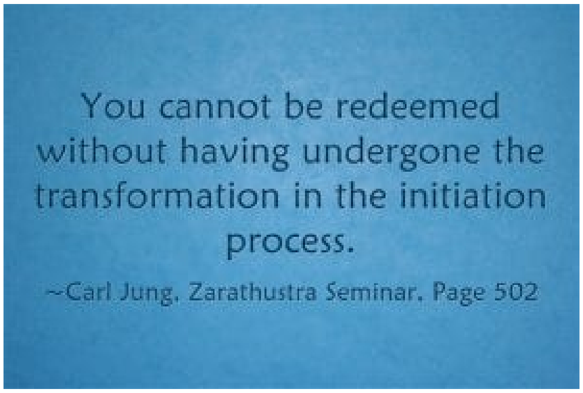
The unconscious is that which we do not know, therefore we call it the unconscious.

~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 1348



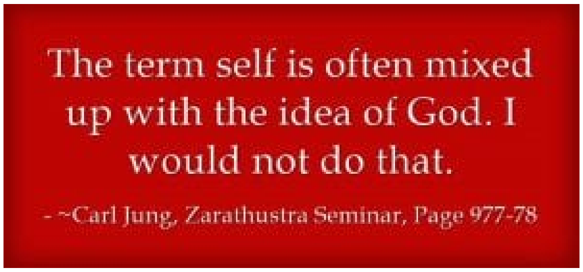
Nobody has ever known what this primal matter is. The alchemists did not know, and nobody has found out what is really meant by it, because it is a substance in the unconscious which is needed for the incarnation of the god.

~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 886



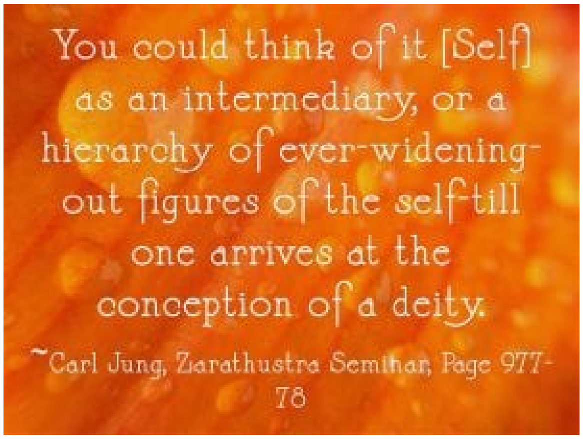
You cannot be redeemed without having undergone the transformation in the initiation process.

~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 502



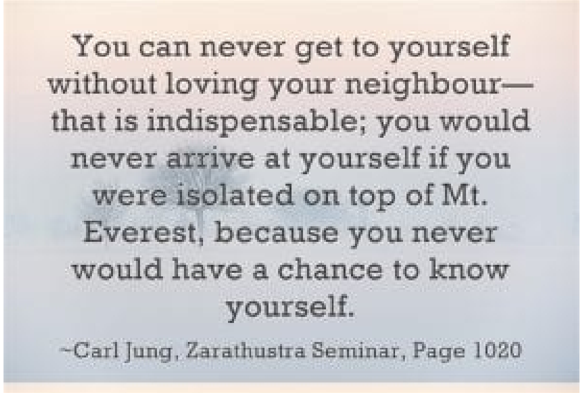
The term self is often mixed up with the idea of God. I would not do that.

- ~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 977-78



You could think of it [Self] as an intermediary, or a hierarchy of ever-widening-out figures of the self till one arrives at the conception of a deity.

~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 977-78



You can never get to yourself without loving your neighbour—that is indispensable; you would never arrive at yourself if you were isolated on top of Mt. Everest, because you never would have a chance to know yourself.

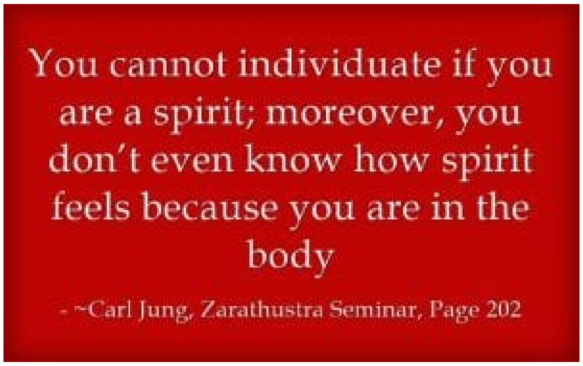
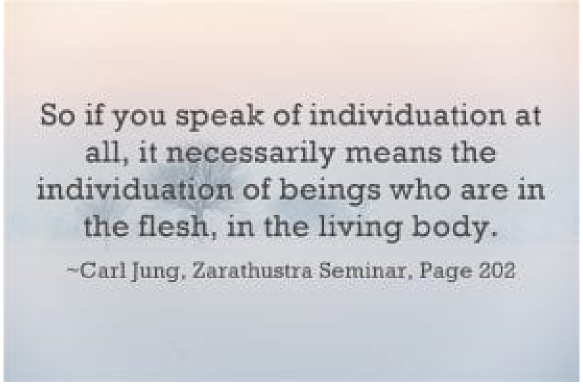
And if you lose yourself in the crowd, in the whole of humanity, you also never arrive at yourself; just as you can get lost in your isolation, you can also get lost in utter abandonment to the crowd.

~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 1020



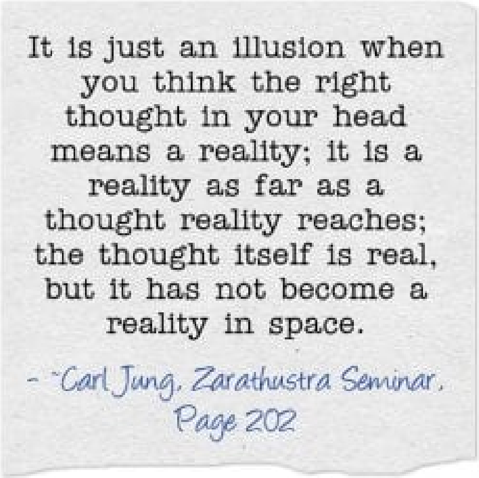
You cannot individuate if you are a spirit; moreover, you don't even know how spirit feels because you are in the body

- ~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 202



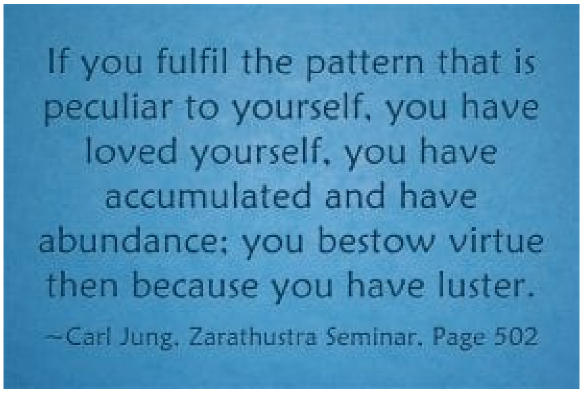
So if you speak of individuation at all, it necessarily means the individuation of beings who are in the flesh, in the living body.

~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 202



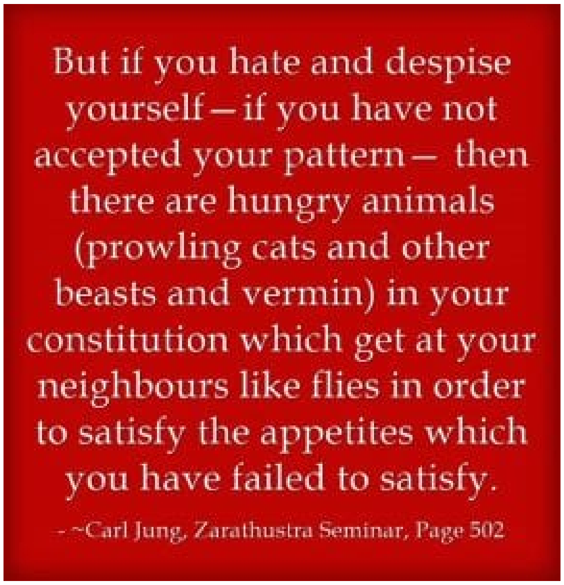
It is just an illusion when you think the right thought in your head means a reality; it is a reality as far as a thought reality reaches; the thought itself is real, but it has not become a reality in space.

- ~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 202



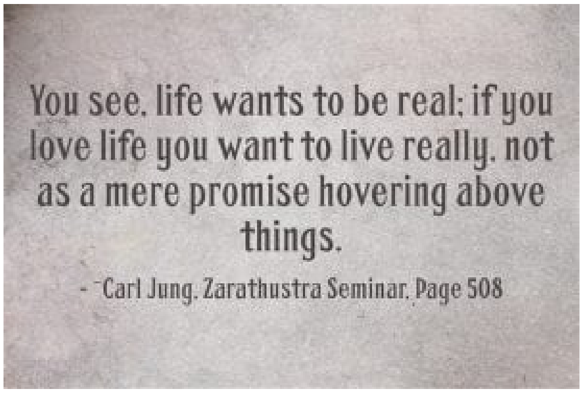
If you fulfil the pattern that is peculiar to yourself, you have loved yourself, you have accumulated and have abundance; you bestow virtue then because you have luster.

~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 502



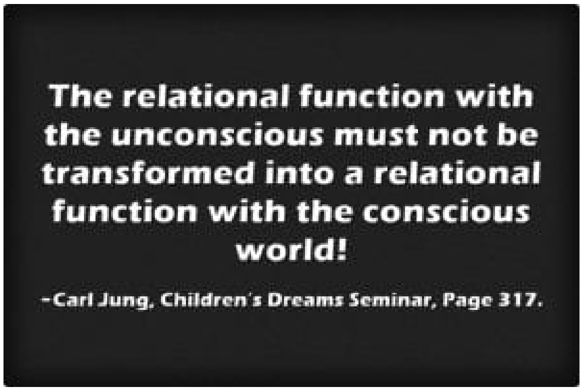
But if you hate and despise yourself—if you have not accepted your pattern— then there are hungry animals (prowling cats and other beasts and vermin) in your constitution which get at your neighbours like flies in order to satisfy the appetites which you have failed to satisfy.

- ~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 502



You see, life wants to be real; if you love life you want to live really, not as a mere promise hovering above things.

- ~Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 508



The relational function with the unconscious must not be transformed into a relational function with the conscious world!

In the Old Testament it says: "Your old men shall dream dreams." They had a wise anima who could open their inner ears.

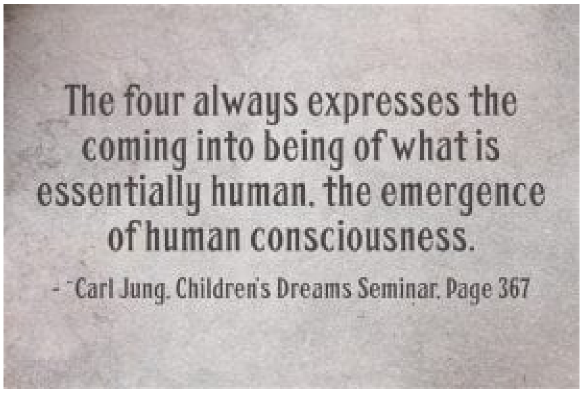
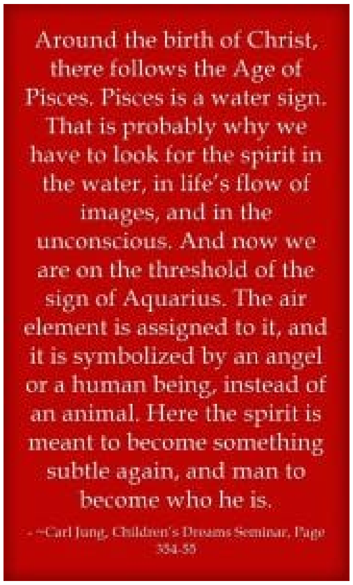
Moreover, the unconscious has a different relation to death than we ourselves have. For example, it is very surprising in which way dreams anticipate death.

~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 343



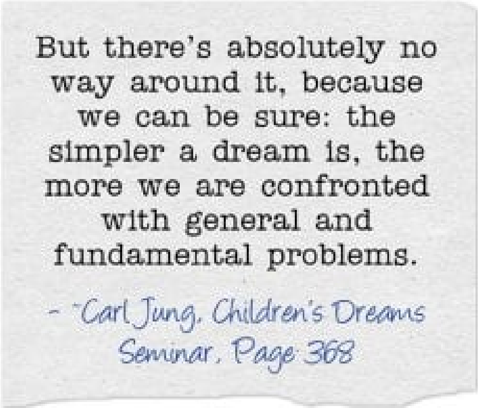
The four always expresses the coming into being of what is essentially human, the emergence of human consciousness.

- ~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 367



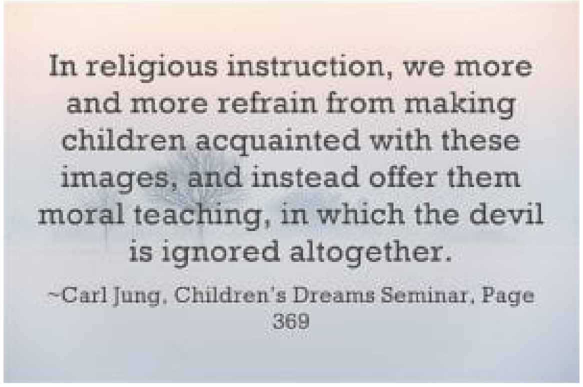
Around the birth of Christ, there follows the Age of Pisces. Pisces is a water sign. That is probably why we have to look for the spirit in the water, in life's flow of images, and in the unconscious. And now we are on the threshold of the sign of Aquarius. The air element is assigned to it, and it is symbolized by an angel or a human being, instead of an animal. Here the spirit is meant to become something subtle again, and man to become who he is.

- ~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 354-55



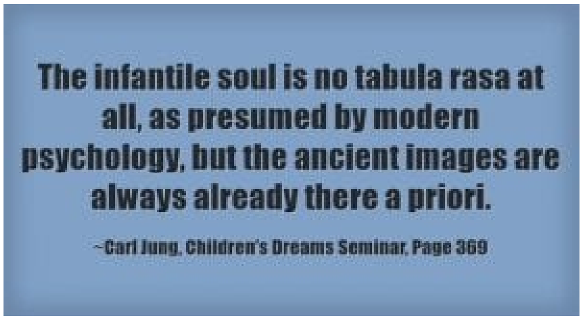
But there's absolutely no way around it, because we can be sure: the simpler a dream is, the more we are confronted with general and fundamental problems.

- ~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 368



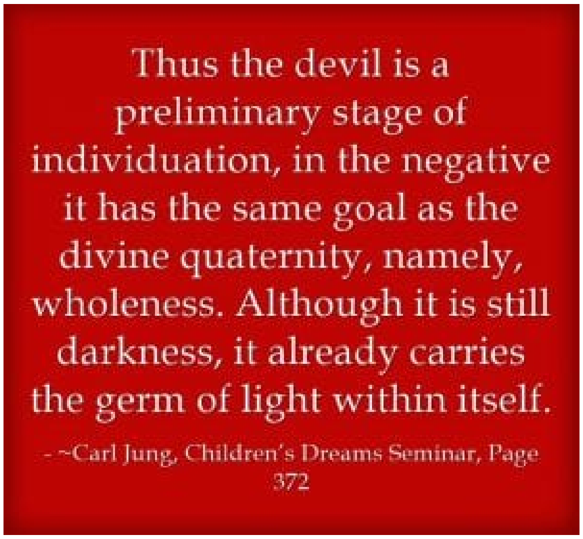
In religious instruction, we more and more refrain from making children acquainted with these images, and instead offer them moral teaching, in which the devil is ignored altogether.

~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 369



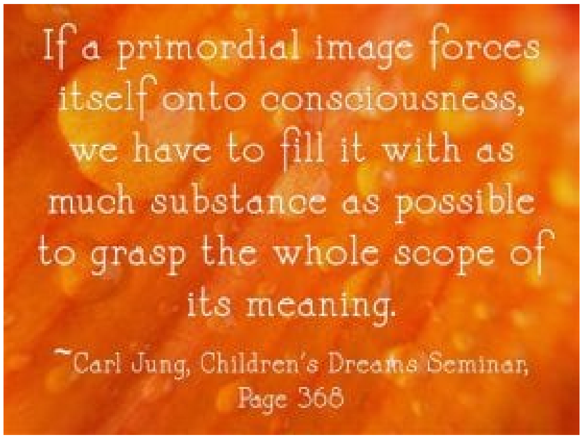
The infantile soul is no tabula rasa at all, as presumed by modern psychology, but the ancient images are always already there a priori.

~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 369



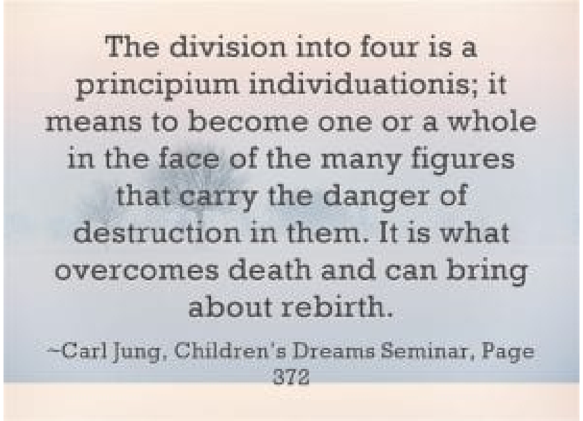
Thus the devil is a preliminary stage of individuation, in the negative it has the same goal as the divine quaternity, namely, wholeness. Although it is still darkness, it already carries the germ of light within itself.

- ~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 372



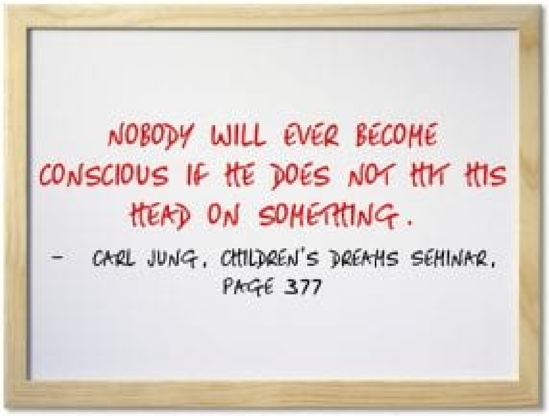
If a primordial image forces itself onto consciousness, we have to fill it with as much substance as possible to grasp the whole scope of its meaning.

~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 368



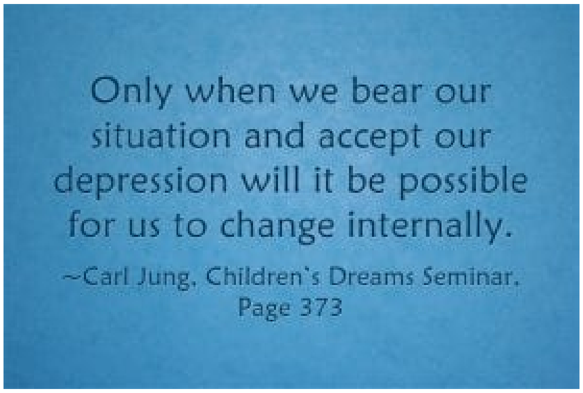
The division into four is a principium individuationis; it means to become one or a whole in the face of the many figures that carry the danger of destruction in them. It is what overcomes death and can bring about rebirth.

~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 372



NOBODY WILL EVER BECOME CONSCIOUS IF HE DOES NOT HIT HIS HEAD ON SOMETHING.

– CARL JUNG, CHILDREN'S DREAMS SEMINAR, PAGE 377



Only when we bear our situation and accept our depression will it be possible for us to change internally.

As the unconscious has a tendency to project itself into the outer world, there is a danger that one might get dissipated in the environment, instead of staying with oneself.

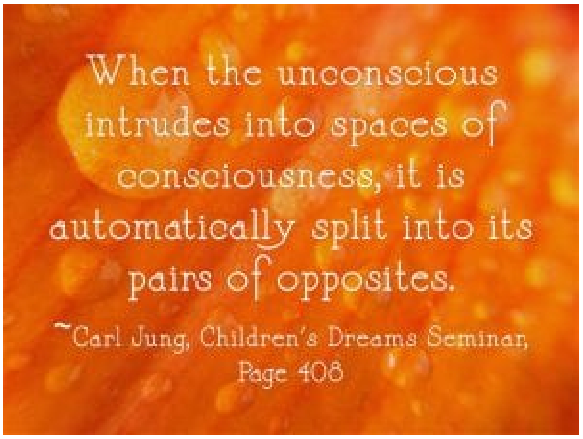
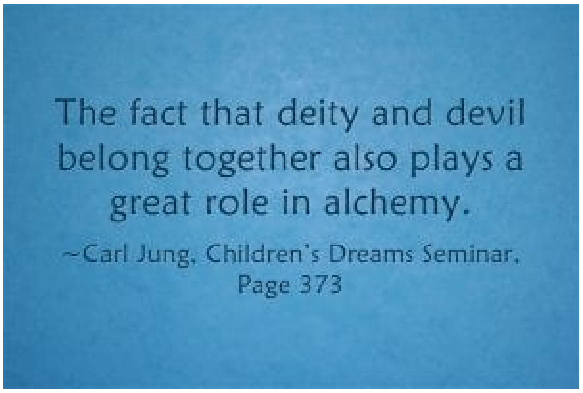
In the process of individuation, too, new contents can announce themselves in this devouring form and darken consciousness; this is experienced as a depression, that is to say, as being pulled downward.

- ~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 373.



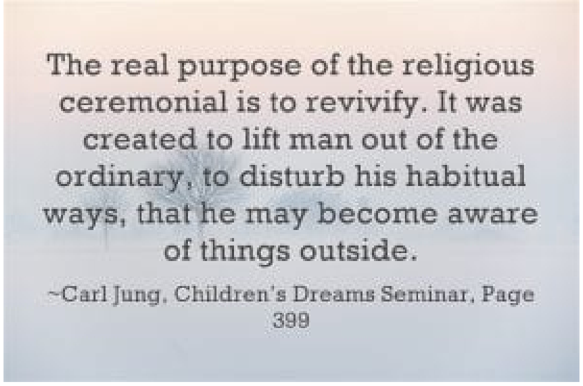
When the unconscious intrudes into spaces of consciousness, it is automatically split into its pairs of opposites.

~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 408



The fact that deity and devil belong together also plays a great role in alchemy.

~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 373



The real purpose of the religious ceremonial is to revivify. It was created to lift man out of the ordinary, to disturb his habitual ways, that he may become aware of things outside.

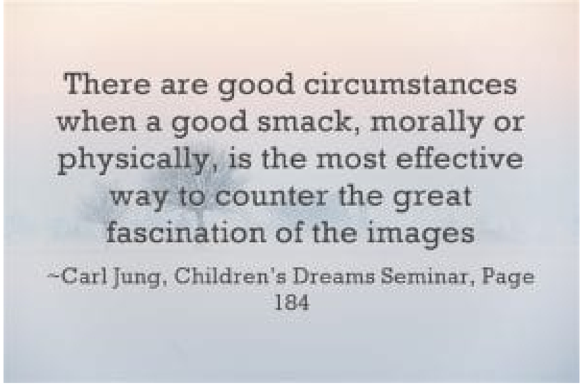
CHILDREN ALSO CONTAIN A FUTURE PERSONALITY WITHIN THEMSELVES, THE BEING THAT THEY WILL BE IN THE FOLLOWING YEARS.

- CARL JUNG, CHILDREN'S DREAMS SEMINAR, PAGE 50



There are good circumstances when a good smack, morally or physically, is the most effective way to counter the great fascination of the images

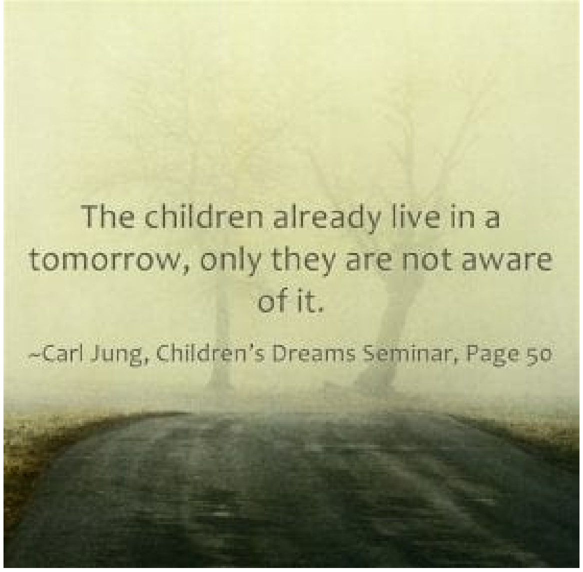
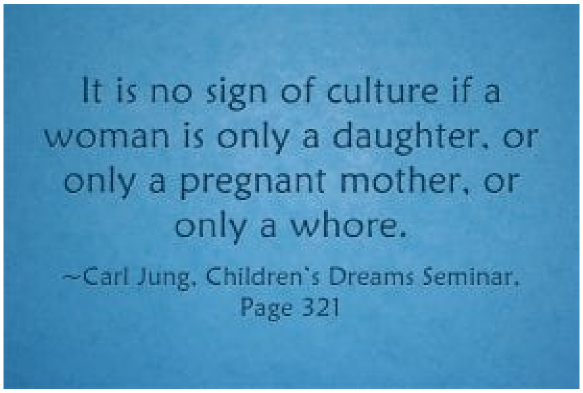
Four flows emanate from the navel, two air- and two blood -vessels, so to speak, through which the growing child receives its food, the blood, and the pneuma.

~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 365-6



The children already live in a tomorrow, only they are not aware of it.

~Carl Jung, Children's Dreams Seminar, Page 50



It is no sign of culture if a woman is only a daughter, or only a pregnant mother, or only a whore.

In Sahasrara there is no difference. The next conclusion could be that there is no object, no God, there is nothing but Brahman. There is no experience because it is One, without a second. It is asleep, it is not, and that is why it is nirvana.

- ~Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminars, Page 59.

We are entangled in the roots, and we ourselves are the roots.

We make roots, we cause roots to be, we are rooted in the soil, and there is no getting away for us, because we must be there as long as we live.

Machines are running away with us, they are demons; they are like those huge old saurians that existed when man was a sort of lizard-monkey and deadly afraid of their hooting and tooting. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 502

A big city is like a holocaust of humanity, as Zola expressed it. Man has built his own funeral pyre and it is destroying him, and so our whole world is being destroyed. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Page 502

Art is just a particular way of decorating the nest in which you lay your eggs. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Pages 913-914

The center of that totality does not necessarily coincide with the ego system, just as the center of our galaxy of stars does not coincide with our sun, and the center of our solar system does not coincide with the earth; we cannot assume that our earth is the center of the universe. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Pages 1158-1159

It was discovered long ago that the earth is in the periphery of something bigger, it is an appendix of the sun, and even the sun is an appendix of a larger system, a galaxy of unknown extent. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Pages 1158-1159

We cannot think of our earth as a sun, nothing is revolving round us except perhaps the moon; the ego is a little system like the earth with the moon, but it is by no means the center of the universe. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar,

Pages 1158-1159

The Self is the center of the totality of the psyche in as far as we can measure it or have an intuition about it, or in as far as we have dreams about it, and surely beyond, for we cannot assume that we are informed through our dreams of everything that is happening in our psyche. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Pages 1158-1159

We cannot even be certain that it is our own psyche; it might be, but there are many things in our unconscious, and we are by no means sure whether they really belong to us or to somebody else. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Pages 1158-1159

A revelation always means a revealing will, a will to manifest which is not identical with your own will and which is not your activity. You may be overcome by it; it falls upon you. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 876.

Every light, every fire, comes to an end, and there would be utter darkness, but there is still left the light of the self, which is the supreme light. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 792.

So the self is not only an unconscious fact, but also a conscious fact: the ego is the visibility of the self. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 977.

The self would be the preceding stage, a being that is more than man and that definitely manifests; that is the thinker of our thoughts, the doer of our deeds, the maker of our lives, yet it is still within the reach of human experience. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Pages 977-978

The term self is often mixed up with the idea of God. I would not do that. I would say that the term self should be reserved for that sphere which is within the reach of human experience, and we should be very careful not to use the word God too often. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Pages 977-978.

It [Self] is a restricted universality or a universal restrictedness, a paradox; so it is a relatively universal being and therefore doesn’t deserve to be called “God.” Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Pages 977-978

One man alone cannot reach the self. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 787

The unconscious is that which we do not know, therefore we call it the unconscious. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 1348

Nobody has ever known what this primal matter is. The alchemists did not know, and nobody has found out what is really meant by it, because it is a substance in the unconscious which is needed for the incarnation of the god. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 886

You cannot be redeemed without having undergone the transformation in the initiation process. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 502.

The term self is often mixed up with the idea of God. I would not do that. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Pages 977-978.

You could think of it [Self] as an intermediary, or a hierarchy of ever-widening-out figures of the self-till one arrives at the conception of a deity. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Pages 977-978.

You can never get to yourself without loving your neighbour—that is indispensable; you would never arrive at yourself if you were isolated on top of Mt. Everest, because you never would have a chance to know yourself. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 1020

And if you lose yourself in the crowd, in the whole of humanity, you also never arrive at yourself; just as you can get lost in your isolation, you can also get lost in utter abandonment to the crowd. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 1020

You cannot individuate if you are a spirit; moreover, you don’t even know how spirit feels because you are in the body. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 202

So if you speak of individuation at all, it necessarily means the individuation of beings who are in the flesh, in the living body. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 202

It is just an illusion when you think the right thought in your head means a reality; it is a reality as far as a thought reality reaches; the thought itself is real, but it has not become a reality in space. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 202

If you fulfil the pattern that is peculiar to yourself, you have loved yourself, you have accumulated and have abundance; you bestow virtue then because you have luster. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 502

But if you hate and despise yourself—if you have not accepted your pattern— then there are hungry animals (prowling cats and other beasts and vermin) in your constitution which get at your neighbours like flies in order to satisfy the appetites which you have failed to satisfy. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 502

You see, life wants to be real; if you love life you want to live really, not as a mere promise hovering above things. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 508

Life inevitably leads down into reality. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 508

Life is of the nature of water: it always seeks the deepest place, which is always below in the darkness and heaviness of the earth. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 508

If you carefully sterilize everything that you do you make an extract the impurity and leave it at the bottom, and once the water of life is poisoned, it doesn't need much to make everything wrong. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 1058

Every light, every fire comes to an end, and there would be utter darkness, but there is still left the light of the self, which is the supreme light. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 792.

There is no morality, no moral decision, without freedom. There is only morality when you can choose, and you cannot choose if you are forced. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 262

The self would be the preceding stage, a being that is more than man and that definitely manifests; that is the thinker of our thoughts, the doer of our deeds, the maker of our lives, yet it is still within the reach of human experience. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 1348

Therefore it is absolutely necessary that, in the process of individuation, everybody should become aware of his creative instinct, no matter how small it is. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 667

And mind you, the animus is as terrible a reality as the anima. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 295

Through being creative one creates the thing that has come into existence in this moment, that was in a potential existence before. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 73

Inasmuch as you say these creative forces are in Nietzsche or in me or anywhere else, you cause an inflation, because man does not possess creative powers, he is possessed by them. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 57.

There is little difference between Nietzsche's life and the life of a saint; he forsook his ordinary life, and went into the woods. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 57

We cannot say the side of the spirit is twice as good as the other side; we must bring the pairs of opposites together in an altogether different way, where the rights of the body are just as much recognized as the rights of the spirit. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 235.

You see that quite clearly in the moment when you check the creative impulse; nothing is more poisonous to the nervous system than a disregarded or checked creative impulse. It even destroys people's organic health. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 654.

All people who claim to be spiritual try to get away from the fact of the body; they want to destroy it in order to be something imaginary, but they never will be that, because the body denies them; the body says otherwise. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 64.

I could say just as well that you could never attain the self without isolation; it is both being alone and in relationship. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 797.

The spirit can easily be anything, but the earth can only be something definite. So remaining true to the earth would mean maintaining your conscious relationship to the body. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 66

Don't run away and make yourself unconscious of bodily facts, for they keep you in real life and help you not to lose your real way in the world of mere possibilities where you are simply blindfolded. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 66

You don't see the archetypal world, but live like a pressed flower in the pages of a book, a mere memory of yourself. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 972.

The great lure of the archetypal situation is that you yourself suddenly cease to be. You cease to think and are acted upon as though carried by a great river with no end. You are suddenly eternal. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 240.

The indispensable condition is that you have an archetypal experience, and to have that means that you have surrendered to life. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 972

If your life has not three dimensions, if you don't live in the body, if you live on the two-dimensional plane in the paper world that is flat and printed, as if you were only living your biography, then you are nowhere. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 1343.

The archetype itself is an exaggeration and it reaches beyond the confines of humanity. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 1343.

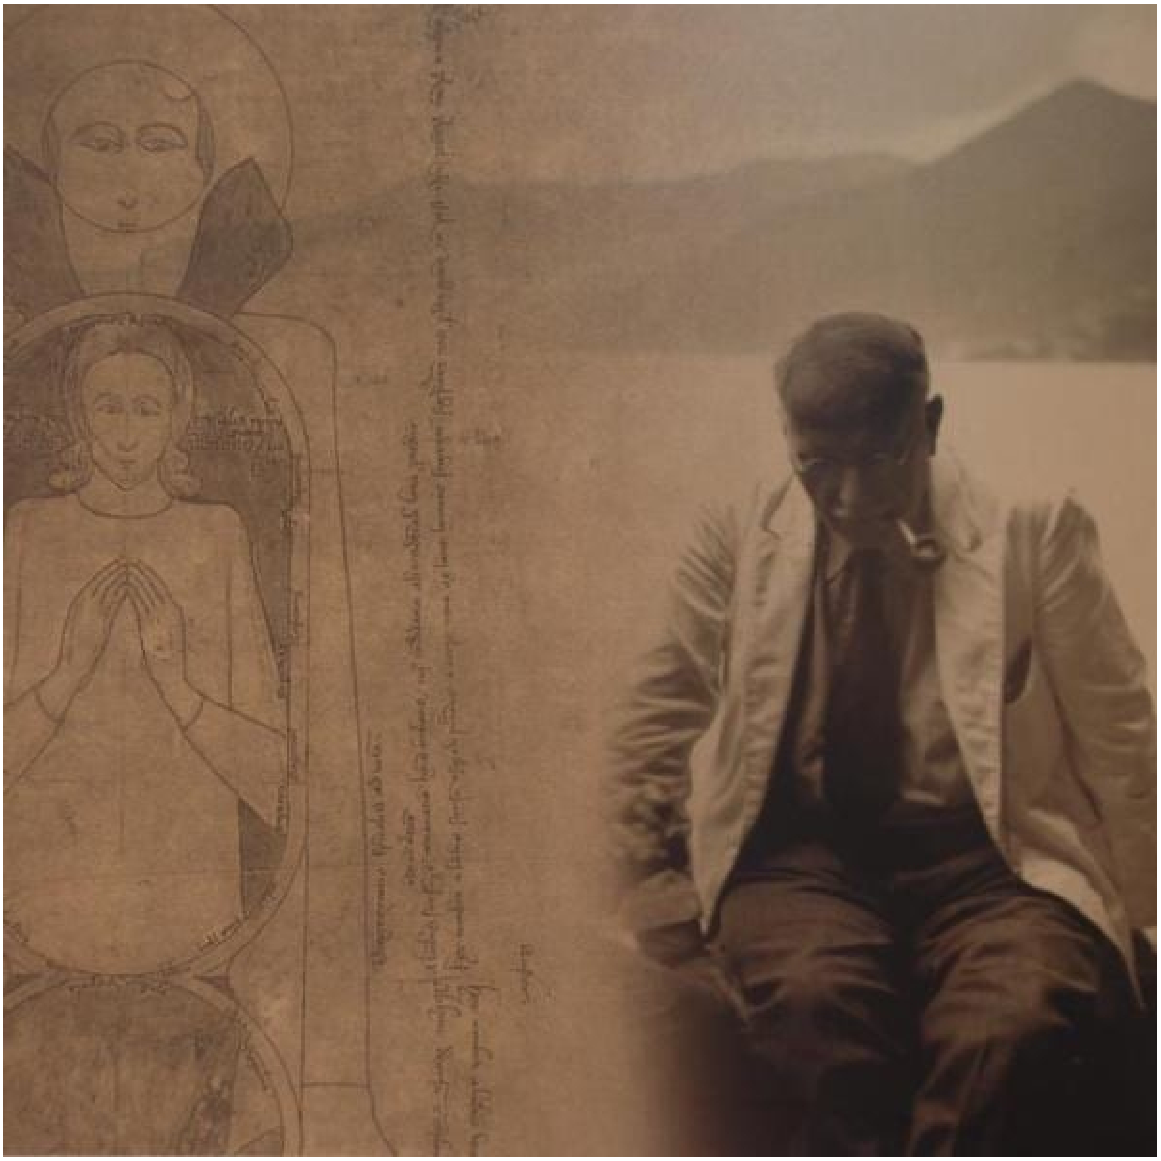
Man's greatest triumph was that God himself incarnated in man in order to illumine the world; that was a tremendous increase of consciousness. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 967

It is a general truth that one can only understand anything in as much as one understands oneself. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 742

It does not matter whether you do a thing or whether it happens to you; whether it reaches you from without or happens within, fate moves through yourself and outside circumstances equally. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 896

Inasmuch as the living body contains the secret of life, it is an intelligence. Carl Jung, Zarathustra Seminar, Page 360.

Carl Jung's Letter to Paul A. Hilty (2019-06-28 20:53)



Carl Jung's Letter to Paul A. Hilty answering a variety of questions:

Dear Mr. Hilty,

Your name, "Hilty" is well known even famous in Switzerland. I thank you for your frank questions, which I will try to answer-helias-with much delay!

1. I am of the Swiss Reformed branch. My father was a parson. On my mother's side I had not less than 6 theologians in the family!

2. I consider myself a Protestant and very much so! I am even protesting against the backwardness of Protestantism.

3. I cannot say that I hold to church teachings, but I am considering them very seriously.

4. I don't believe (in a personal God), but I do know of a power of a very personal nature and an irresistible influence. I call it "God." I used this term because it has been used for this kind of experience since time immemorial.

From this point of view any gods, Zeus, Wotan, Allah, Yahweh, the Summum Bonum, etc., have their intrinsic truth. They are different and fore or less differentiated expressions of aspects of one ineffable truth (Cf. Forward to Answer to Job and "Psychology and Religions," Terry Lectures 1936.)

5. AS "God" is the overwhelming experience He is an ineffable, beyond which I would not dare to make any statements, although I fully accept the traditional inference of this absolute oneness and this complexio oppositorum. The use of such an image obviously includes Nature as an aspect of the Deity.

6. There are no natural laws, only statistical probabilities, included in "God."

7. AS there are not axiomatic laws, any so-called "law" suffers exceptions. Nothing therefore is absolutely impossible except alogical contradiction.

8. I don't' know whether is doing improbable things.

9. Within the reach of my experience I have never encountered a miracle. Thus I don't know whether such things you mention are possible.

10. There is no proof of God's existence. I only know Him as a personal, subjective experience and indirectly through the consensus gentium.

11. This questions is ridiculous. Time and space are epistemological categories indispensable for the description of moving bodies, but incommensurable with objects of inner experience.

12. As far as I can judge from the documents of Christian tradition, Jesus Christ was probably a definite human person, yet highly enveloped in archetypal projections, more so that other historical figures like Buddha, Confucius, Lao-tse, Pythagoras, etc. Inasmuch as Christ represents an archetypal image (he is of diving nature and thus the "son of God." (Cf. Answer to Job and my disquisition about the psychology of the Christ symbol in Aion, Chapter V.)

13. I know of resurrection only because it is a very important archetypal idea. I don't know whether it has ever occurred as a physical fact. I see no point in believing something I don't know. The resurrection is a myth (like questions 14-15)

16. I don't think that the human mind is eternal and therefore I don't' assume that we can think eternal subjects like infinity, immortality, etc. We can only use such words. We just don't know what is going to happen after death. The only thing we know within reasonable certainty is that the psyche is relatively independent of time and space or that time and space (including causality) are relatively dependent upon the psyche. (Vide: Jung and Pauli, the Interpretation of Nature and the Psyche, 1955.) Further conclusions from this fact are very uncertain.

17-20 I do not deny the existence of things unknown and I do not presume to a belief in such matters.

21. "Devil" is a very apt name for certain autonomous powers in the structure of the human psyche. As such the devil seems to me to be a very real figure.

22-24. Unanswerable metaphysical problems beyond my reach.

As you have seen, I could not answer your questions with a simple yes or no, although I should have preferred it. The question of religion is unfortunately more complicated. It can't be reduced to mere belief of unbelief. This is only true for a confession or a church, but not for religion, the latter being chiefly a matter of experience.

Since my answers are far from being complete I have added some books where you can get the necessary information.

Yours Sincerely, C.G. Jung [Letter dated October 25, 1955]

Letter from Carl Jung to Alice Lewisohn Crowley suggesting Suicide (2019-06-28 21:05)

[1]

Letter from Carl Jung to Alice Lewisohn Crowley suggesting Suicide:

My Dear Mrs. Crowley, 20 December 1941

I begin to feel my age and whenever I get a bit too tired I also feel my heart and that is decidedly disagreeable and makes me cross with the whole world, which is damnable anyhow. I went through a period of black depression during the first 4 days. Only yesterday I began to feel human again. And then your situation in Europe came back to me with a bang!

I beg you to consider your life. If they are going to send you to Poland, you only can suicide yourself. Please forgive this crudeness! It is my anxiety for your life which makes me say such things. Remember, I warned you before America went to war. It is urgent that you do something and quick! Europe is in a desperate situation.

I am sorry and I am helpless.

Yours affectionately, C.G. Jung

Carl Jung on the Anima and Animus (2019-06-29 05:00)

[1]

Dr. Evans: To be more specific, Dr. Jung, you have used the concepts, anima and animus, which you are now identifying in terms of sex, male or female. I wonder if you could elaborate perhaps even more specifically on these terms? Take the term "anima" first. Is this again part of the inherited nature of the individual?

Dr. Jung: Well, this is a bit complicated, you know.

The anima is an archetypal form, expressing the fact that a man has a minority of feminine or female genes.

That is something that doesn’t appear or disappear in him, that is constantly present, and works as a female in a man.

As early as the 16th century, the Humanists had discovered that man had an anima, and that each man carried female within himself.

They said it; it is not a modem invention.

The same is the case with the animus.

It is a masculine image in a woman’s mind which is sometimes quite conscious, sometimes not quite conscious; but it is called into life the moment that woman meets a man who says the right things.

Then because he says it, it is all true and he is the fellow, no matter what he is.

Those are particularly well-founded archetypes, those two.

And you can lay hands on their bases. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Pages 16-18.

Carl Jung and "The Universal view of the world is a Religion." (2019-06-29 05:00)

[1]

A very universal view of the world is always un-conditioned, it is the ultimate truth of what you have to believe.

For example, in intellectual matters you are bound to apply the hypothesis which seems most valid.

It is immoral merely to take a position of negation.

The universal view of the world is a religion.

To most people modern religion is a historical sentimentality rather than a view of the world, for this we rather go to philosophy or science.

A religion should be an ultimate view of the world; it should be unconditioned and absolute.

When religion becomes relative and conditional it is no longer valid, it will no longer release the unconditioned forces within you and your impersonal attitude must have behind it an absolute and unconditioned principle which must be accepted in its totality.

If the channels are too narrow, the stream will overflow and become destructive.

This happened at the time of the Reformation. Then the channel became too narrow, after the Gothic period.

As a result of the Reformation life flowed once again, but it left the ecclesiastical channel and a world science began.

At the Reformation two things happened which upset the absolute attitude of that day:

(a) Crucifixes were found in Mexico, which undermined the belief in the uniqueness of the Christian religion where the crucifixion was the central teaching,

(b) The rediscovery of Gnosticism, the Dionysian myth and so forth, which showed that teachings similar to Christianity had been prevalent before the birth of Christ.

The Church met this problem by going back to the authority of the Fathers, instead of seeking for new ways to meet the new truth. She just dismissed the new truth.

The Germanic peoples, especially, split off from the Catholic Church.

This branch kept on dividing.

Protestantism is a negation of medieval Christianity, and is on the way to differentiation.

The Catholic Church bases itself on the mediation of the Church; Protestantism denies that this is necessary, and so the Church is already undermined.

Protestantism claims that man has direct access to God, which opens the way to differences of revelation, that is, to schisms.
This means that man is individual, which for the Church is the work of the devil.

Thus the impersonal view represented by the Church became dissolved, and with it our impersonal attitude.

Now we have none. Carl Jung, Cornwall Seminar, Page 15.

Carl Jung on "The Nature of Objects" (2019-06-29 05:15)

[1]

The Nature of the Value of Objects.

1. evident or real;
2. unconscious or magical value.

What is this magical value? The primitives say it Is mans, value, prestige soul-power.

They only realize the dynamic side, not the ideal side. All energy must have form, e.g. heat or electricity, etc.
So too mental energy must have form, this takes the form of idea or image.

When you perceive psychic energy, you perceive an image; glee, all images have energy.

Repressed energy comes up in the form of phantasy and through the realization of such phantasies energy is released.

The primitive thinks of such energy as "soul." For example, the sorcars hove cages hanging in the trees to catch the souls in bird form, enticed to the herd of the man by rice grains.

When we suffer from lack of psychic energy, we say we have a depression or an inhibition, not realizing that part of our mental hierarchy has one away beyond our control, that we have, in fact, lost our soul.

Our psychic system is a careful synthesis and from this parts may fall out and become autonomous.
Such parts may come into opposition with the remainder.

The primitive would say this condition was due to loss of soul. Thus images are energy or libido.

This is why the magician makes images, for such things are energy - magic energy.

In as much as such a figure makes an impression on you, it releases energy.

An object that can do that is indeed magic. For example, the Mona Lisa attracts people, it is energy. Such a picture is mana., fetish, etc.
The magic value of the object exists in certain images.

The magical value of the object consists in projection of the anima or animus. (This is looked at from within, the intuitive approach.)

But if we want to describe the structure of the psyche looked at from without, In the scientific way, we have to speak of the psyche as a system of adaptations. Carl Jung; Cornwall Seminar; Page 13.

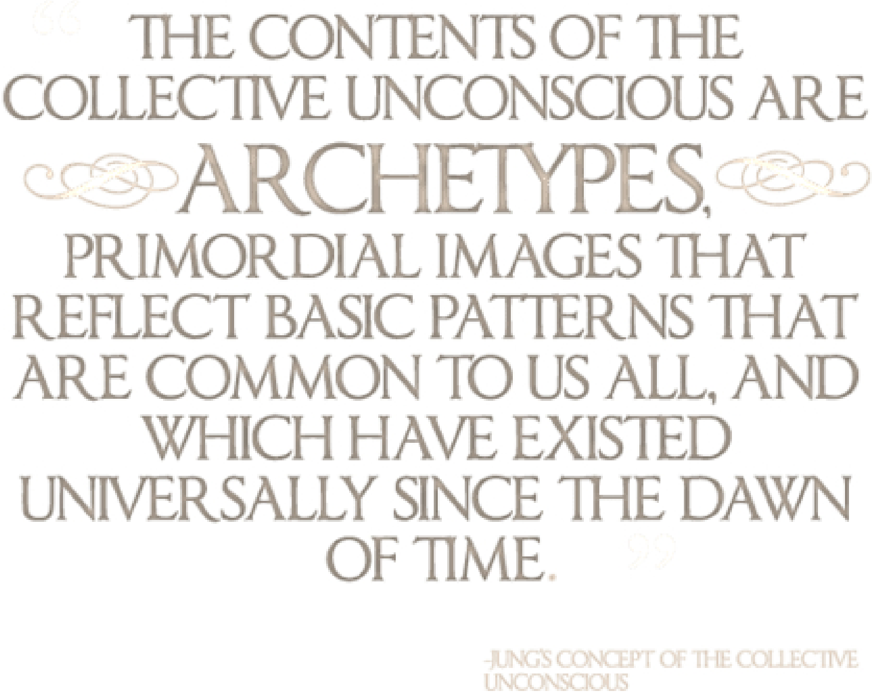
Carl Jung on: The Unconscious: Archetypes (2019-06-29 05:55)

[1]



"THE CONTENTS OF THE COLLECTIVE UNCONSCIOUS ARE ARCHETYPES, PRIMORDIAL IMAGES THAT REFLECT BASIC PATTERNS THAT ARE COMMON TO US ALL, AND WHICH HAVE EXISTED UNIVERSALLY SINCE THE DAWN OF TIME."

-JUNG'S CONCEPT OF THE COLLECTIVE UNCONSCIOUS

Carl Jung on: The Unconscious: Archetypes

Dr. Evans: You mentioned earlier that Freud's Oedipal situation was an example of an archetype. At this time would you please elaborate on the concept, archetype?

Dr. Jung: Well, you know what a behavior pattern is, the way in which a weaver bird builds its nest.

That is an inherited form in him.

He will apply certain symbiotic phenomena, between insects and plants.

They are inherited patterns of behavior.

And so man has, of course, an inherited scheme of functioning.

You see, his liver, his heart, all his organs, and his brain will always function in a certain way, following its pattern.

You may have a great difficulty seeing it because you cannot compare it.

There are no other similar beings like man, that are articulate, that could give an account of their functioning. If that were the case, we could—I don't know what.

But because we have no means of comparison, we are necessarily unconscious about the whole conditions.

It is quite certain, however, that man is born with a certain functioning, a certain way of functioning, a certain pattern of behavior which is expressed in the form of archetypal images, or archetypal forms.

For instance, the way in which a man should behave is expressed by an archetype.

Therefore, you see, the primitives tell such stories. A great deal of education goes through story telling.

For instance, they call together the young men, and two older men act out before the eyes of the younger all the things they should not do.

Then they say, "Now that’s exactly the thing you shall not do."

Another way is they tell them all of the things they should not do, like the Decalogue, "Thou shalt not," and that is always supported by mythological tales.

That, of course, gave me a motive to study the archetypes, because I began to see that the structure of what I then called the collective unconscious was really a sort of agglomeration of such typical images, each of which had a unique quality.

The archetypes are, at the same time, dynamic.

They are instinctual images that are not intellectually invented.

They are always there and they produce certain processes in the unconscious that one could best compare with myths.

That’s the origin of mythology.

Mythology is a pronouncing of a series of images that formulate the life of archetypes.

So the statements of every religion, of many poets, etc., are statements about the inner mythological process, which is a necessity because man is not complete if he is not conscious of that aspect of things.

For instance, our ancestors have done so and so, and so shall you do.

Or such and such a hero has done so and so, and that is your model.

For instance, in the teachings of the Catholic church, there are several thousand saints.

They show us how to do— They have their legends— And that is Christian mythology.

In Greece, you know, there was Theseus and there was Heracles, models of fine men, of gentlemen, you know; and they teach us how to behave.

They are archetypes of behavior.

I became more and more respectful of archetypes, and that naturally led me on to a profound study of them.

And now, by Jove, there is an enormous factor, very important for our further development and for our well-being, that should be taken into account.

It was, of course, difficult to know where to begin, because it is such an enormously extended field.

And the next question I asked myself was, "Now, where in the world has anybody been busy with that problem?"

I found that nobody had except a peculiar spiritual movement that went together with the beginning of Christianity, namely, the Gnostics; and that was the first thing actually that I saw.

They were concerned with the problem of archetypes, and made a peculiar philosophy of it.

Everybody makes a peculiar philosophy of it when he comes across it naively, and doesn't know that those are structural elements of the unconscious psyche.

The Gnostics lived in the first, second and third centuries; and I wanted to know what was in between that time and today, when we suddenly are confronted by the problems of the collective unconscious which were the same two thousand years ago, though we are not prepared to admit that problem.

I was always looking for something in between, you know, something that would link that remote past with the present moment.

I found to my amazement that it was alchemy, that which is understood to be a history of chemistry.

It was, one could almost say, nothing less than that. It was a peculiar spiritual movement or a philosophical movement.

They called themselves philosophers, like Narcissism.

And then I read the whole accessible literature, Latin and Greek.

I studied it because it was enormously interesting.

It [Alchemy] is the mental work of 1,700 years, in which there is stored up all they could make out about the nature of the archetypes, in a peculiar way that's foolish.

It is not simple.

Most of the texts are no more published since the middle ages, the last editions dated in the middle or the end of the sixteenth century, all in Latin; some texts are in Greek, not a few very important ones.

That has given me no end of work, but the result was most satisfactory, because it showed me the development of our unconscious relation to the collective unconscious and the variations our consciousness has undergone; why the being's unconscious is concerned with these mythological images.

For instance, such phenomena as in Hitler, you know.

That is a psychical phenomenon, and we’ve got to understand these things.

To me, of course, it has been an enormous problem because it is a factor that has determined the fate of millions of European people, and of Americans.

Nobody can deny that he has been influenced by the war.

That was all Hitler’s doing—and that’s all psychology, our foolish psychology.

But you only come to an understanding of these things when you understand the background from which it springs.

It is just as though, as if a terrific epidemic of typhoid fever were breaking out, and you say, "That is typhoid fever— isn’t that a marvelous disease!"

It can take on enormous dimensions and nobody knows anything about it. Nobody takes care of the water supply, nobody thinks of examining the meat or anything like that; but everyone simply states, "This is a phenomenon."—Yes, but one doesn’t understand it.

Of course, I cannot tell you in detail about alchemy.

It is the basic of our modern way of conceiving things, and therefore, it is as if it were right under the threshold of consciousness.

This is a wonderful picture of how the development of archetypes, the movement of archetypes, looks when you look upon them with broader perspective.

Maybe from today you look back into the past and you see how the present moment has evolved out of the past.

It is just as if the alchemistic philosophy— That sounds very curious; we should give it an entirely different name.

Actually, it has a different name.

It [Alchemy] is also called Hermetic Philosophy, though, of course, that conveys just as little as the term alchemy.—It was the parallel development, as Narcissism was, to the conscious development of Christianity, of our Christian philosophy, of the whole psychology of the middle ages.

So you see, in our days we have such and such a view of the world, a particular philosophy, but in the unconscious we have a different one.

That we can see through the example of the alchemistic philosophy that behaves to the medieval consciousness exactly like the unconscious behaves to ourselves.

And we can construct or even predict the unconscious of our days when we know what it has been yesterday.

Or, for instance, to take a more concise archetype, like the archetype of the ford—the ford to a river.

Now that is a whole situation.

You have to cross a ford; you are in the water; and there is an ambush or a water animal, say a crocodile or something like that.

There is danger and something is going to happen.

The problem is how you escape.

Now this is a whole situation and it makes an archetype.

And that archetype has now a suggestive effect upon you.

For instance, you get into a situation; you don’t know what the situation is; you suddenly are seized by an emotion or by a spell; and you behave in a certain way you have not foreseen at all—you do something quite strange to yourself.

Dr. Evans: Could this also be described as spontaneous?

Dr. Jung: Quite spontaneous.

And that is done through the archetype that is concerned.

Of course, we have a famous case in our Swiss history of the King Albrecht, who was murdered in the ford of the Royce not very far from Zurich.

His murderers were hiding behind him for the whole stretch from Zurich to the Royce, quite a long stretch, and after deliberating, still couldn’t come together about whether they wanted to kill the king or not.

The moment the king rode into the ford, they thought, "Murder!"

They shouted, "Why do we let him abuse us?"

Then they killed him, because this was the moment they were seized; this was the right moment.

So you see, when you have lived in primitive circumstances, in the primeval forest among primitive populations, then you know that phenomenon.

You are seized with a certain spell and you do a thing that is unexpected.

Several times when I was in Africa, I went into such situations where I was amazed afterwards.

One day I was in the Sudan and it was really a very dangerous situation, which I didn’t recognize at the moment at all.

But I was seized with a spell.

I did something which I wouldn’t have expected and I couldn’t have intended.

You see, the archetype is a force. It has an autonomy, and it can suddenly seize you. It is like a seizure.

So, for instance, falling in love at first sight, that is such a case.

You have a certain image in yourself, without knowing it, of the woman—of any woman.

You see that girl, or at least a good imitation of your type, and instantly you get the seizure; you are caught.

And after ward you may discover that ⍰ it was a hell of a mistake.

You see, a man is quite capable, or is intelligent enough to see that the woman of his choice was no choice; he has been captured!

He sees that she is no good at all, that she is a hell of a business, and he tells me so.

He says, "For God’s sake, doctor, help me to get rid of that woman." He can’t though, and he is like clay in her fingers.

That is the archetype.

It has all happened because of the archetype of the anima, though he thinks it is all his soul, you know.

It is like the girl—any girl.

When a man sings very high, for instance, sings a high C, she thinks he must have a very wonderful spiritual character, and she is badly disappointed when she marries that particular "letter."

Well, that’s the archetype of the animus.

Dr. Evans: Now Dr. Jung, to be even a bit more specific, you have suggested that in our society, in all societies, there are symbols that in a sense direct or determine what a man does. Then you also suggest that somehow these symbols become "inborn" and, in part, "inbred."

Dr. Jung: They don’t become; they are.

They are to begin with. You see, we are born into a pattern; we are a pattern.

We are a structure that is pre-established through the genes.

Dr. Evans: To recapitulate then, the archetype is just a higher order of an instinctual pattern, such as your earlier example of a bird building a nest.Is that how you intended to describe it?

Dr. Jung: It is a biological order of our mental functioning, as, for instance, our biological-physiological function follows a pattern.

The behavior of any bird or insect follows a pattern, and that is the same with us.

Man has a certain pattern that makes him specifically human, and no man is born without it.

We are only deeply unconscious of these facts because we live by all our senses and outside of ourselves.

If a man could look into himself, he could discover it.

When a man discovers it in our days, he thinks he is crazy—really crazy.

Dr. Evans: Now would you say the number of such archetypes are limited or predetermined, or can the number be increased?

Dr. Jung: Well, I don't know what I do know about it; it is so blurred.

You see, we have no means of comparison.

We know and we see that there is a behavior, say like incest; or there is a behavior of violence, a certain kind of violence; or there is a behavior of panic, of power, etc.

Those are areas, as it were, in which there are many variations.

It can be expressed in this way or that way, you know.

And they overlap, and often you cannot say where the one form begins or ends.

It is nothing concise, because the archetype in itself is completely unconscious and you only can see the effects of it.

You can see, for instance, when you know a person is possessed by an archetype; then you can divine and even prognosticate possible developments.

This is true because when you see that the man is caught by a certain type of woman in a certain very specific way, you know that he is caught by the anima.

Then the whole thing will have such and such complications and such and such developments because it is typical.

The way the anima is described is exceedingly typical.

I don't know if you know Rider Haggard's She, or L'Atlantide by Benoît—c'est la femme fatale.

Dr. Evans: To be more specific, Dr. Jung, you have used the concepts, anima and animus, which you are now identifying in terms of sex, male or female. I wonder if you could elaborate perhaps even more specifically on these terms? Take the term "anima" first. Is this again part of the inherited nature of the individual?

Dr. Jung: Well, this is a bit complicated, you know.

The anima is an archetypal form, expressing the fact that a man has a minority of feminine or female genes.

That is something that doesn’t appear or disappear in him, that is constantly present, and works as a female in a man.

As early as the 16th century, the Humanists had discovered that man had an anima, and that each man carried female within himself.

They said it; it is not a modem invention.

The same is the case with the animus.

It is a masculine image in a woman’s mind which is sometimes quite conscious, sometimes not quite conscious; but it is called into life the moment that woman meets a man who says the right things.

Then because he says it, it is all true and he is the fellow, no matter what he is.

Those are particularly well-founded archetypes, those two.

And you can lay hands on their bases. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Pages 16-18.

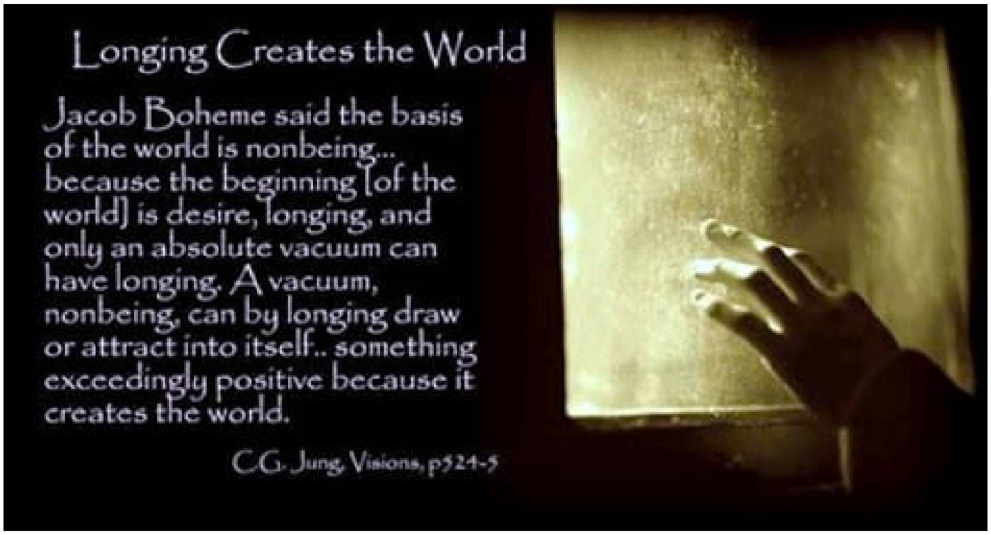
Carl Jung: It is the kingdom of things that are not. (2019-06-30 03:30)

[1]



Longing Creates the World

Jacob Boheme said the basis of the world is nonbeing... because the beginning [of the world] is desire, longing, and only an absolute vacuum can have longing. A vacuum, nonbeing, can by longing draw or attract into itself.. something exceedingly positive because it creates the world.

C.G. Jung, Visions, p524-5

Mrs. Crowley: The two symbols together would perhaps suggest the Yin and the Yang.

Dr. Jung: That is true.

The bowl would be the female and the staff the male form, which means a union of opposites; the male and female are together in this poimen.

It also means neither male nor female.

That is expressed in the so-called Gospel according to the Egyptians, in the conversation of Jesus with Salome.

Salome asked Jesus when the prophecies would be fulfilled, and Jesus said: "When ye shall tread upon the vesture of shame, and when the two shall be one, and the male with the female neither male nor female. "

That is, when a thing is yea and nay, then it is neither yea nor nay, it is both and therefore beyond.

The unrecognizable and incomprehensible thing can only be expressed by a paradox; when we cannot understand a thing in its essence, when we cannot grasp it by our means of reasoning, we describe it in such a form.

For instance, the Buddhistic concept of nirvana is positive non-being, or being, non-being.

It is the kingdom of things that are not.

The beginning of the world, the creative point, the origin, is also described by a paradox: a completely empty fullness, or completely full emptiness.

And Jakob Boehme, that famous mystic and philosopher of the sixteenth century, said that the basis of the world is the nil, the Nichts, the non-being, and that it cannot be otherwise because the beginning is desire, longing, and only an absolute vacuum can have longing.

A vacuum, non-being, can by longing draw or attract into itself, while anything that is full already possesses and can desire no longer.

So this desire, and Schopenhauer's primordial will, is something exceedingly positive because it creates the world; and yet it is nothing, for only where there is nothing can something come to pass. Carl Jung, Visions Seminar, Pages 524-525

Carl Jung on Shamanism, The Mass, Osirification and Mystery Religions. (2019-06-30 04:38)

[Carl Jung on Shamanism, The Mass, Osirification and Mystery Religions.]

The numinous experience of the individuation process is, on the archaic level, the prerogative of shamans and medicine men; later, of the physician, prophet, and priest; and finally, at the civilized stage, of philosophy and religion.

The shaman's experience of sickness, torture, death, and regeneration implies, at a higher level, the idea of being made whole through sacrifice, of being changed by transubstantiation and exalted to the pneumatic man in a word, of apotheosis.

The Mass is the summation and quintessence of a development which began many thousands of years ago and, with the progressive broadening and deepening of consciousness, gradually made the isolated experience of specifically gifted individuals the common property of a larger group.

The underlying psychic process remained, of course, hidden from view and was dramatized in the form of suitable "mysteries" and "sacraments" these being reinforced by religious teachings, exercises, meditations, and acts of sacrifice which plunge the celebrant so deeply into the sphere of the mystery that he is able to become conscious of his intimate connection with the mythic happenings.

Thus, in ancient Egypt,we see how the experience of "Osirification," originally the prerogative of the Pharaohs, gradually passed to the aristocracy and finally, towards the end of the Old Kingdom, to the single individual as well.

Similarly, the mystery religions of the Greeks, originally esoteric and not talked about, broadened out into collective experience, and at the time of the Caesars it was considered a regular sport for Roman tourists to get themselves initiated into foreign mysteries.

Christianity, after some hesitation, went a step further and made celebration of the mysteries a public institution, for, as we know, it was especially concerned to introduce as many people as possible to the experience of the mystery.

So, sooner or later, the individual could not fail to become conscious of his own transformation and of the necessary psychological conditions for this, such as confession and repentance of sin.

The ground was prepared for the realization that, in the mystery of transubstantiation, it was not so much a question of magical influence as of psychological processes a realization for which the alchemists had already paved the way by putting their opus operatum at least on a level with the ecclesiastical mystery, and even attributing to it a cosmic significance since, by its means, the divine world-soul could be liberated from imprisonment in matter.

As I think I have shown, the "philosophical" side of alchemy is nothing less than a symbolic anticipation of certain psychological insights, and these to judge by the example of Gerhard Dorn were pretty far advanced by the end of the sixteenth century.

63 Only our intellectualized age could have been so deluded as to see in alchemy nothing but an abortive attempt at chemistry, and in the interpretative methods of modern psychology a mere "psychologizing," i.e., annihilation, of the mystery.

Just as the alchemists knew that the production of their stone was a miracle that could only happen "Deo concedente," so the modern psychologist is aware that he can produce no more than a description, couched in scientific symbols, of a psychic process whose real nature transcends consciousness just as much as does the mystery of life or of matter.

At no point has he explained the mystery itself, thereby causing it to fade.

He has merely, in accordance with the spirit of Christian tradition, brought it a little nearer to individual consciousness, using the empirical material to set forth the individuation process and show it as an actual and experienceable fact.

To treat a metaphysical statement as a psychic process is not to say that it is "merely psychic," as my critics assert in the fond belief that the word "psychic" postulates something known.

It does not seem to have occurred to people that when we say "psyche" we are alluding to the densest darkness it is possible to imagine.

The ethics of the researcher require him to admit where his knowledge comes to an end.

This end is the beginning of all wisdom. Carl Jung, Psychology and Religion, Pages 294-296, Para 448.

Carl Jung on the nature of Sacrifice (2019-06-30 05:14)

[1]

[Carl Jung on the nature of Sacrifice]

When, therefore, I give away something that is "mine," what I am giving is essentially a symbol, a thing of many meanings; but, owing to my unconsciousness of its symbolic character, it adheres to my ego, because it is part of my personality.

Hence there is, explicitly or implicitly, a personal claim bound up with every gift. There is always an unspoken "give that thou mayest receive."

Consequently the gift always carries with it a personal intention, for the mere giving of it is not a sacrifice.

It only becomes a sacrifice if I give up the implied intention of receiving something in return. If it is to be a true sacrifice, the gift must be given as if it were being destroyed.

Only then is it possible for the egoistic claim to be given up.

Were the bread and wine simply given without any consciousness of an egoistic claim, the fact that it was unconscious would be no excuse, but would on the contrary be sure proof of the existence of a secret claim.

Because of its egoistic nature, the offering would then inevitably have the character of a magical act of propitiation, with the unavowed purpose and tacit expectation of purchasing the good will of the Deity.

That is an ethically worthless simulacrum of sacrifice, and in order to avoid it the giver must at least make himself sufficiently conscious of his identity with the gift to recognize how far he is giving himself up in giving the gift.

In other words, out of the natural state of identity with what is "mine" there grows the ethical task of sacrificing oneself, or at any rate that part of oneself which is identical with the gift.

One ought to realize that when one gives or surrenders oneself there are corresponding claims attached, the more so the less one knows of them.

The conscious realization of this alone guarantees that the giving is a real sacrifice.

For if I know and admit that I am giving myself, forgoing myself, and do not want to be repaid for it, then I have sacrificed my claim, and thus a part of myself.

Consequently, all absolute giving, a giving which is a total loss from the start, is a self-sacrifice.

Ordinary giving for which no return is received is felt as a loss; but a sacrifice is meant to be like a loss, so that one may be sure that the egoistic claim no longer exists.

Therefore the gift should be given as if it were being destroyed. But since the gift represents myself, I have in that case destroyed myself, given myself away without expectation of return.

Yet, looked at in another way, this intentional loss is also a gain, for if you can give yourself it proves that you possess yourself.

Nobody can give what he has not got.

So anyone who can sacrifice himself and forgo his claim must have had it; in other words, he must have been conscious of the claim.

This presupposes an act of considerable self-knowledge, lacking which one remains permanently unconscious of such claims.

It is therefore quite logical that the confession of sin should come before the rite of transformation in the Mass.

The self-examination is intended to make one conscious of the selfish claim bound up with every gift, so that it may be consciously given up; otherwise the gift is no sacrifice.

The sacrifice proves that you possess yourself, for it does not mean just letting yourself be passively taken: it is a conscious and deliberate self surrender, which proves that you have full control of yourself, that is, of your ego.

The ego thus becomes the object of a moral act, for "I" am making a decision on behalf of an authority which is supraordinate to my ego nature. I am, as it were, deciding against my ego and renouncing my claim.

The possibility of self-renunciation is an established psychological fact whose philosophical implications I do not propose to discuss.

Psychologically, it means that the ego is a relative quantity which can be subsumed under various supraordinate authorities.

What are these authorities? They are not to be equated outright with collective moral consciousness, as Freud wanted to do with his superego, but rather with certain psychic conditions which existed in man from the beginning and are not acquired by experience.

Behind a man's actions there stands neither public opinion nor the moral code, but the personality of which he is still unconscious. Just as a man still is what he always was, so he already is what he will become.

The conscious mind does not embrace the totality of a man, for this totality consists only partly of his conscious contents, and for the other and far greater part, of his unconscious, which is of indefinite extent with no assignable limits.

In this totality the conscious mind is contained like a smaller circle within a larger one.

Hence it is quite possible for the ego to be made into an object, that is to say, for a more compendious personality to emerge in the course of development and take the ego into its service.

Since this growth of personality comes out of the unconscious, which is by definition unlimited, the extent of the personality now gradually realizing itself cannot in practice be limited either.

But, unlike the Freudian superego, it is still individual.

It is in fact individuality in the highest sense, and therefore theoretically limited, since no individual can possibly display every quality. (I have called this process of realization the "individuation process")

So far as the personality is still potential, it can be called transcendent, and so far as it is unconscious, it is indistinguishable from all those things that carry its projections in other words, the unconscious personality merges with our environment in accordance with the above-named participation mystique.

This fact is of the greatest practical importance because it renders intelligible the peculiar symbols through which this projected entity expresses itself in dreams.

By this I mean the symbols of the outside world and the cosmic symbols.

These form the psychological basis for the conception of man as a microcosm, whose fate, as we know, is bound up with the macrocosm through the astrological components of his character. Carl Jung, Psychology and Religion, Pages 256-259; Para 390-391.

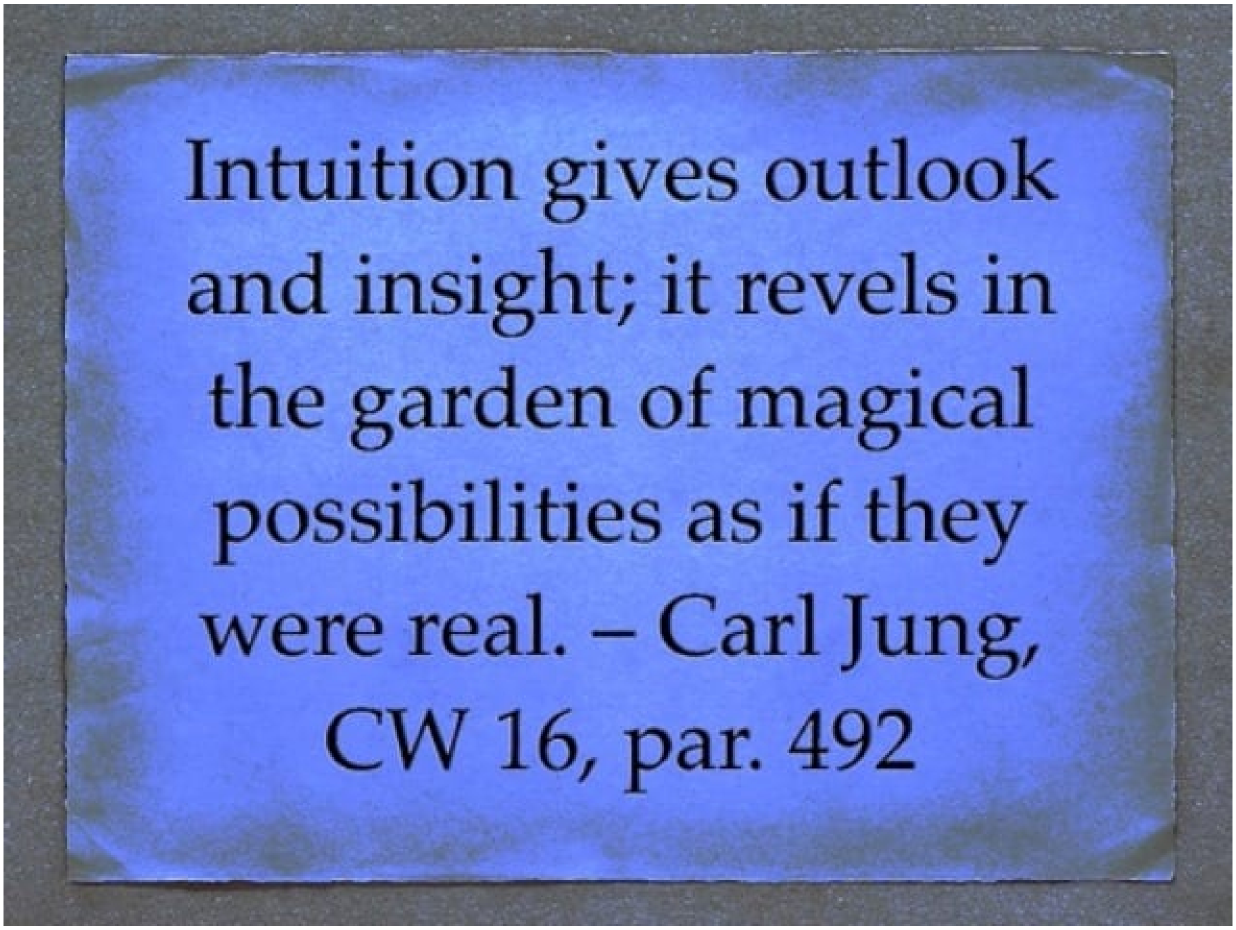
Carl Jung on the "Intuitive Extrovert" and "Intuitive Introvert." (2019-06-30 05:34)

[1]



Intuition gives outlook and insight; it revels in the garden of magical possibilities as if they were real. – Carl Jung, CW 16, par. 492

Dr. Evans: More specifically, what would be an example of the difference between an intuitive extrovert and an intuitive introvert?

Dr. Jung: Well, you have chosen a somewhat difficult case, because one of the most difficult types is the intuitive introvert.

The intuitive extrovert you find in all kinds of bankers, gamblers, etc., which is quite understandable.

The introvert is more difficult because he has intuitions as to the subjective factor, namely the inner world; and, of course, that is very difficult to understand because what he sees are most uncommon things, things which he doesn’t like to talk about if he is not a fool.

If he did, he would spoil his own game by telling what he sees, because people won’t understand it.

For instance, once I had a patient, a young woman about 27 or 28.

Immediately after I had seated her, she said, "You know, doctor, I came to you because I’ve a snake in my abdomen."

What! "Yes, a black snake coiled up in the bottom of my abdomen."

I must have made an awful face at her, so she said, "You know that I don’t mean it literally."

I then replied, however, "If you say it was a snake, it was a snake."

In a later conversation with her, which took place about in the middle of her treatment, treatment that only lasted for ten consultations, she reminded me of something she had foretold me.

She had said, "I come ten times and then it will be all right," to which I responded with the question, "How do you know?"

"Oh, I've got a hunch," she said.

Now at about the fifth or sixth hour she said, "Doctor, I must tell you that the snake has risen; it is now about here."

A hunch.

Then on the tenth day I said, "Now this is our last hour, and do you feel cured?"

Just beaming, she replied, "You know, this morning it came up, came out of my mouth, and the head was golden."

Those were her last words.

When it comes to reality now, that same girl came to me because she couldn't hear the step of her feet anymore, because she walked on air, literally. She couldn't hear it, and that frightened her.

When I asked for her address, she said, "Oh, Pension so and so.

Well, it is not just called a pension, but it is a sort of pension."

I had never heard of it.

"I have never heard of that place," I said.

She replied, "It is a very nice place.

There are only young girls there; they are all very nice young girls, very lovely young girls, and they have a merry time.

I often wish they would invite me to their merry evenings."

And I said, "Do they amuse themselves all alone?"

"No," she replied, "there are plenty of young gentlemen coming in; they have a beautiful time, but they never invite me."

It turned out that this was a private brothel.

She was a perfectly decent girl from a very good family, not from here.

She had found that place, I don't know how, and she was completely unaware that they were all prostitutes.

I said, "For heaven's sake, you fell into a very tough place; you'll hasten to get out of it."

She didn't see reality, but she had hunches like everything, vraiment.

Such a person cannot possibly speak of her experiences because everybody would think she was absolutely crazy.

I myself was quite shocked, and I thought, "For heaven's sake, is that case a schizophrenic?"

You don't normally hear that kind of speech; but she assumed that the old man, of course, knew everything and did understand such kind of language.

So you see, if the introverted intuitive would speak what he really perceives, practically no one would understand him; he would be misunderstood.

Thus they learn to keep things to themselves.

You hardly ever hear them talking of these things.

In a way, that is a great disadvantage, but in another way it is an enormous advantage that these people do not speak of their experiences, both their inward experiences and those which occur in human relations.

For instance, they may come into the presence of somebody they don't know, not from Adam, and suddenly they may have inner images.

Now these inner images may give them a great deal of information about the psychology of that person they have just met.

That is typical of cases that often happen.

They suddenly know an important piece of the biography of that person, and if they did not keep things to themselves, they would tell the story.

Then the fat would be in the fire!

So the intuitive introvert has in a way a very difficult life, although it is a most interesting one.

It is quite difficult to get into their confidence.

Dr. Evans: Yes, because they are afraid people will think . . .

Dr. Jung: They are sick.

The things that they hint at are interesting to them, are vital to them, and are utterly strange to the ordinary individual. A psychologist, however, should know of such things.

When people make a psychology, as a psychologist ought to do, it is the very first question—is he introverted or extroverted?

The psychologist must look at entirely different things.

He sees the sensation type; he sees the intuitive type; he sees thinking and feeling types.

These things are complicated.

They are still more complicated because the introverted thinking, for instance, is compensated by extroverted feeling, inferior, archaic, extroverted feeling.

So an introverted thinker may be crude in his feeling, like for instance the introverted philosopher who is always carefully avoiding women may be married by his cook in the end.

Dr. Evans: So we can take your introvert-extrovert orientations and describe a number of types; the sensation-introvert and extrovert types, the feeling-introvert and extrovert types, thinking-introvert and extrovert types, and the intuitive-introvert and extrovert types. In each case these combinations do not represent a concrete category but simply, as you have indicated, a model that can be helpful in understanding the individual.

Dr. Jung: It is just a sort of skeleton to which you have to add the flesh.

One could say that it is like a country mapped out by triangulation points, which doesn't mean that the country consists of triangulation points; that is only in order to have an idea of the distances.

And so it is a means to an end.

It only makes sense as a scheme when you deal with practical cases.

For instance, if you have to explain an introverted-intuitive husband to an extrovert wife, it is a most painstaking affair because, you see, an extrovert sensation type is furtherest away from the ⍰ inner experience and the rational functions.

He adapts and behaves according to the facts as they are, and he is always caught by those facts.

He himself is those facts.

But if the introvert is intuitive, to him that is hell, because as soon as he is in a definite situation, he tries to find a hole where he can get out.

To him, every given situation is just the worst that can happen to him.

He is pinched and feels he is caught, suffocated, chained.

He must break those fetters, because he is the man who will discover a new field. He will plant that field, and as soon as the new plants are coming up, he's done; he's over and no more interested.

Others will reap what he has sown.

When those two marry, the extrovert-sensation and the introvert-intuitive, there is trouble, I can assure you. Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Pages 25-26.

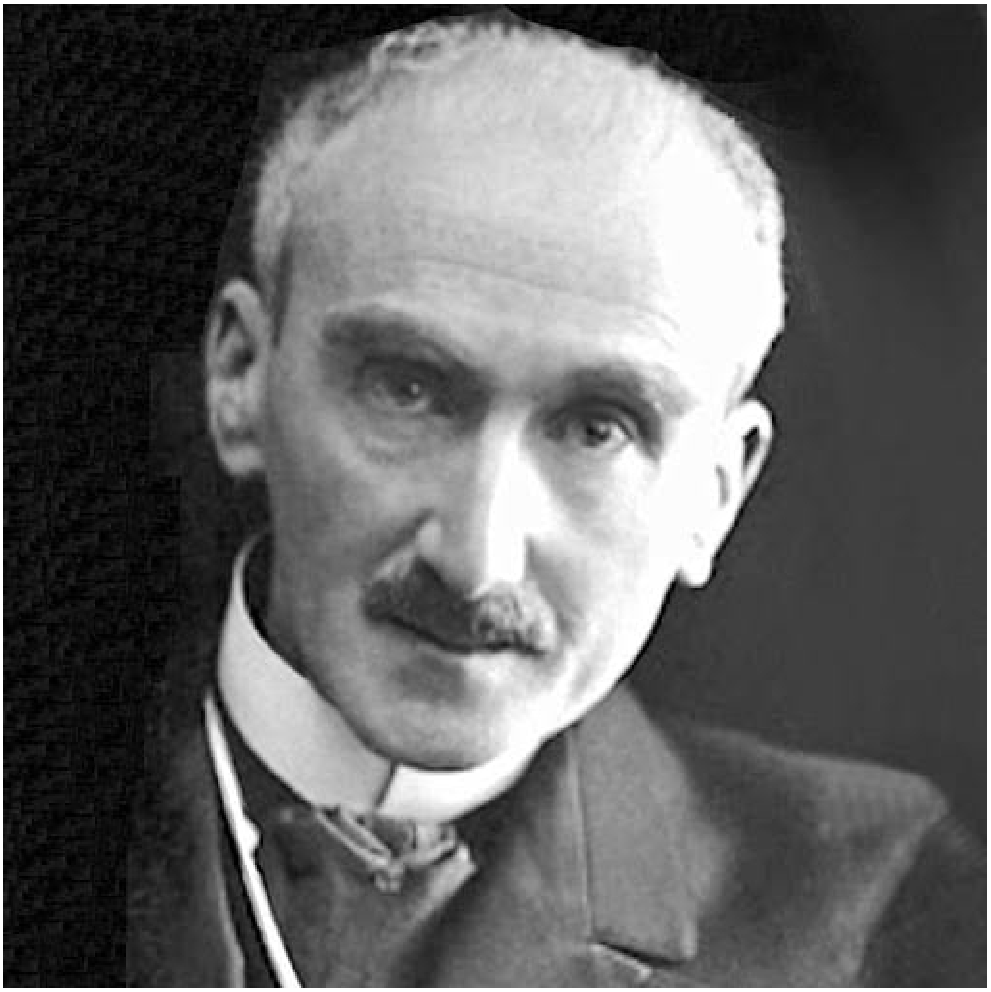
Carl Jung on the possibility of consciousness without a brain. (2019-06-30 05:47)

[1]



[Carl Jung on the possibility of consciousness without a brain.]

For example in 1930, he wrote to Alice Raphael:

… Bergson is quite right when he thinks of the possibility of relatively loose connection between the brain and consciousness, because despite of our ordinary experience the connection might be less tight than we suppose. There is no reason why one shouldn't suppose that consciousness could exist detached from a brain . . . the real difficulty begins … when you should prove that there is consciousness without a brain. It would amount to the hitherto unproven fact of an evidence that there are ghosts.
I think that this is the most difficult thing in the world to create an evidence in that respect entirely satisfactory from a scientific point of view . How can one establish an indisputable evidence of a consciousness without a brain?
I might be satisfied if such a consciousness would be able to write an intelligent book, invent new apparatuses, provide us with new information that couldn't possibly be found in human brains, and if it were evident that there would be no high power medium among the spectators.

But such a thing is quite unthinkable … Trance conditions are certainly very interesting and I know a good deal about them—though never enough.

But they wouldn't yield any strict evidence, because they are conditions of a living brain. Jung to Alice Raphael; September, 16, 1930, Alice Raphael papers. On her contact with Jung, see Sonu Shamdasani's "Who is Jung's Philemon?"; An Unpublished Letter to Alice Raphael„ Jung history, 2:2, 2007, PP. 5-7-

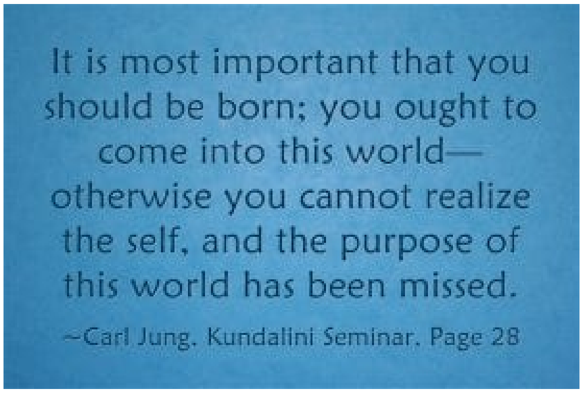
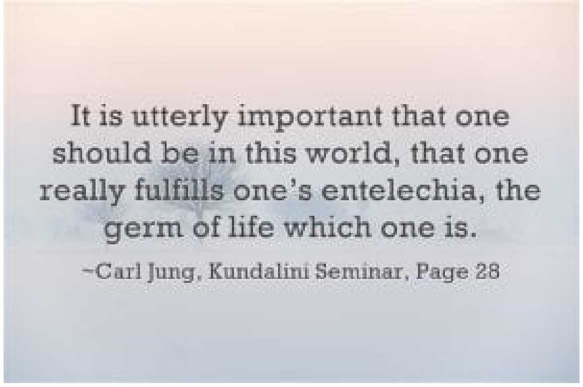
Some Carl Jung Quotations (2019-06-30 05:50)



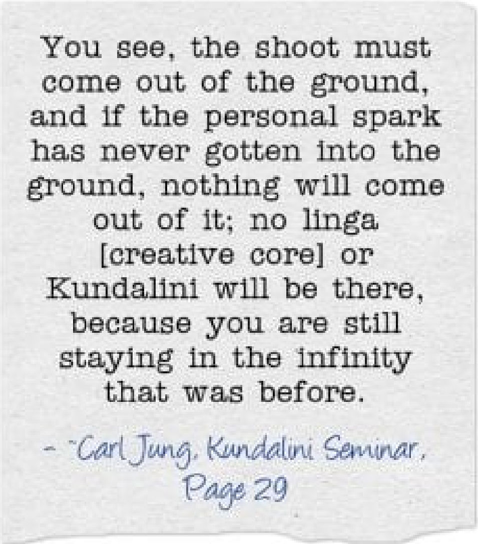
It is most important that you should be born; you ought to come into this world—otherwise you cannot realize the self, and the purpose of this world has been missed.

~Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 28



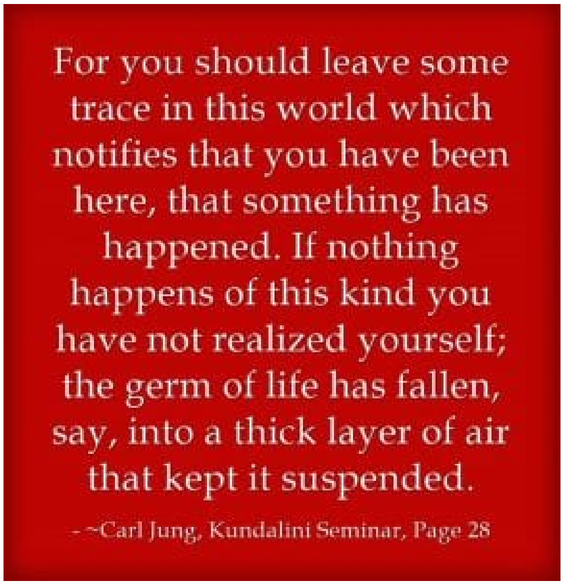
It is utterly important that one should be in this world, that one really fulfills one's entelechia, the germ of life which one is.

~Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 28



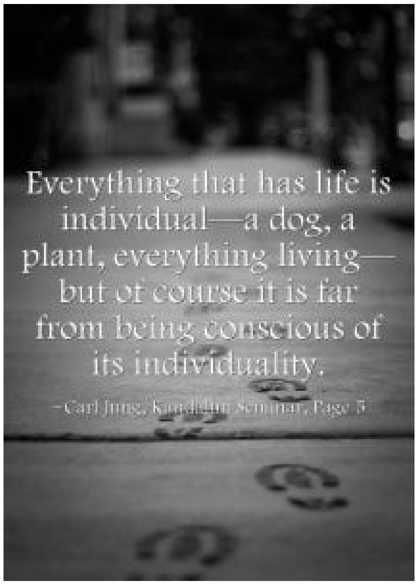
You see, the shoot must come out of the ground, and if the personal spark has never gotten into the ground, nothing will come out of it; no linga [creative core] or Kundalini will be there, because you are still staying in the infinity that was before.

- ~Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 29



For you should leave some trace in this world which notifies that you have been here, that something has happened. If nothing happens of this kind you have not realized yourself; the germ of life has fallen, say, into a thick layer of air that kept it suspended.

- ~Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 28



Everything that has life is individual—a dog, a plant, everything living—but of course it is far from being conscious of its individuality.

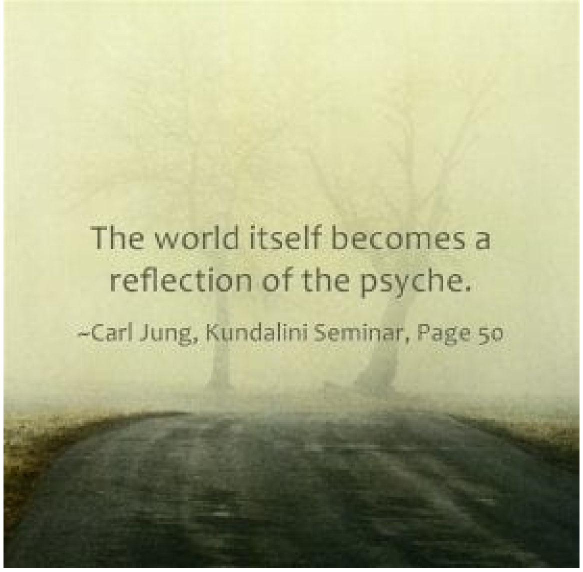
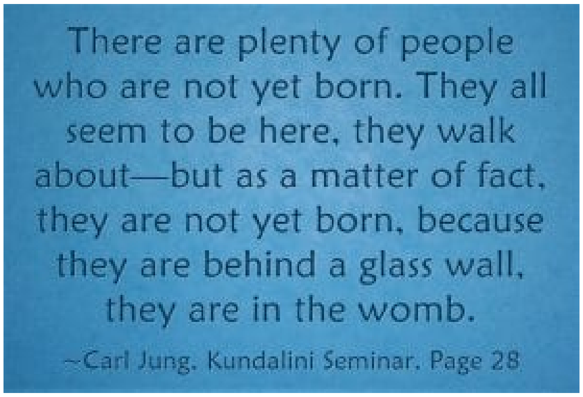
INDIVIDUATION ONLY TAKES PLACE WHEN YOU ARE CONSCIOUS OF IT, BUT INDIVIDUATION IS ALWAYS THERE FROM THE BEGINNING OF YOUR EXISTENCE.

- CARL JUNG, KUNDALINI SEMINAR, PAGE 5



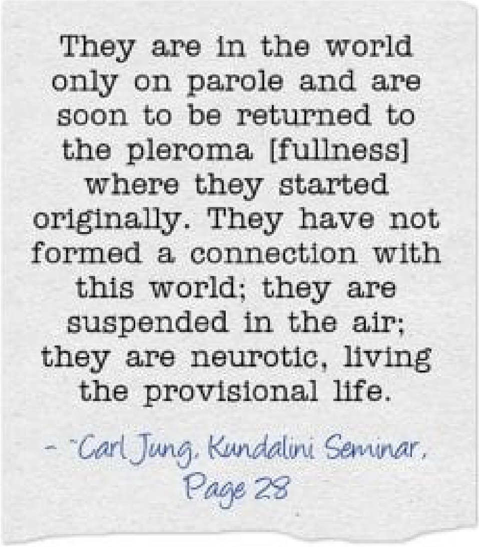
The world itself becomes a reflection of the psyche.

~Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 50



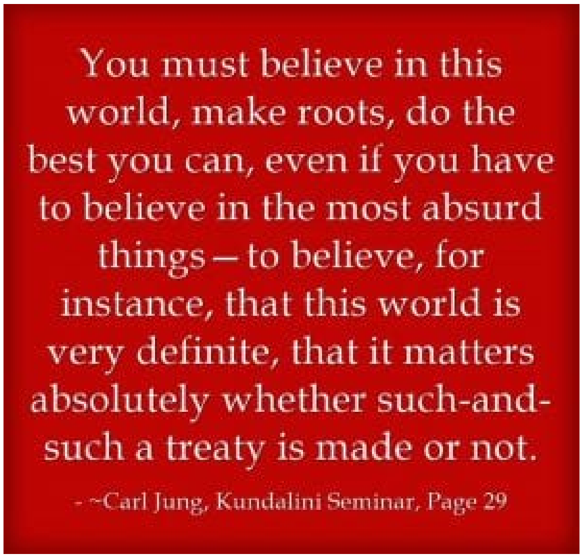
There are plenty of people who are not yet born. They all seem to be here, they walk about—but as a matter of fact, they are not yet born, because they are behind a glass wall, they are in the womb.

~Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 28



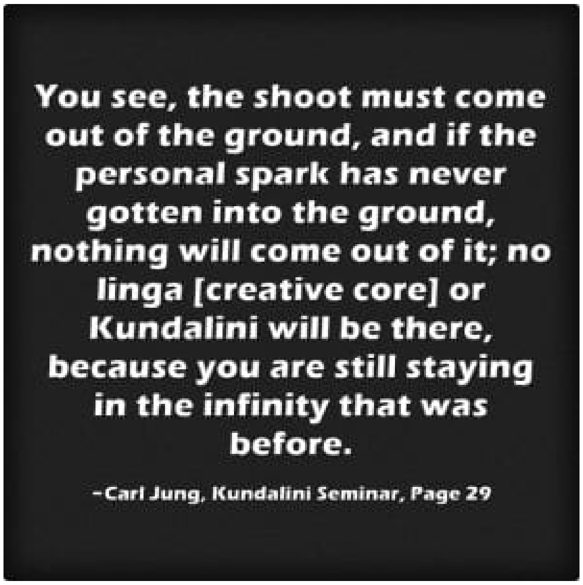
They are in the world only on parole and are soon to be returned to the pleroma [fullness] where they started originally. They have not formed a connection with this world; they are suspended in the air; they are neurotic, living the provisional life.

- ~Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 28



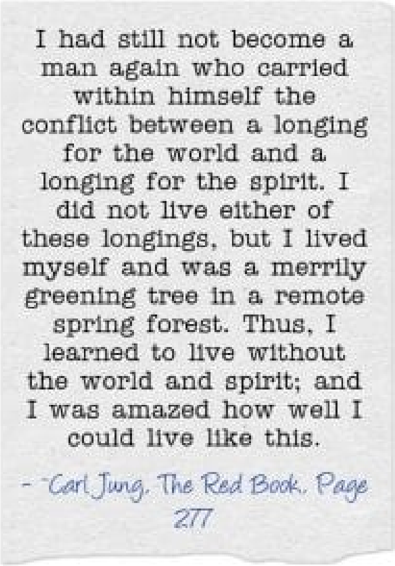
You must believe in this world, make roots, do the best you can, even if you have to believe in the most absurd things—to believe, for instance, that this world is very definite, that it matters absolutely whether such-and-such a treaty is made or not.

- ~Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 29



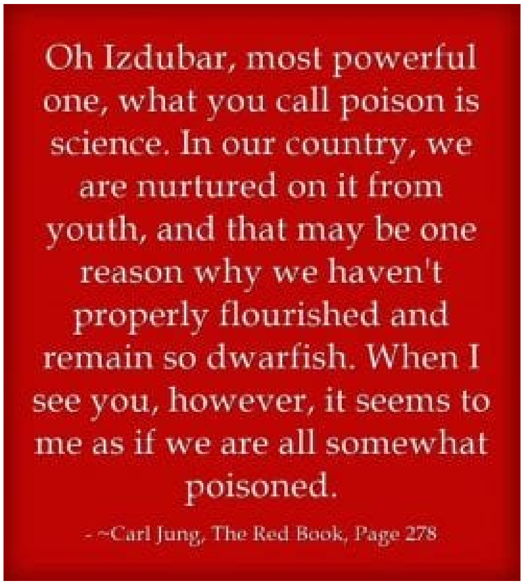
You see, the shoot must come out of the ground, and if the personal spark has never gotten into the ground, nothing will come out of it; no linga [creative core] or Kundalini will be there, because you are still staying in the infinity that was before.

~Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 29



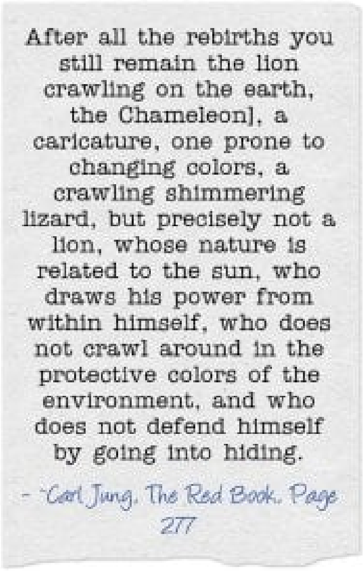
I had still not become a man again who carried within himself the conflict between a longing for the world and a longing for the spirit. I did not live either of these longings, but I lived myself and was a merrily greening tree in a remote spring forest. Thus, I learned to live without the world and spirit; and I was amazed how well I could live like this.

- ~Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 277



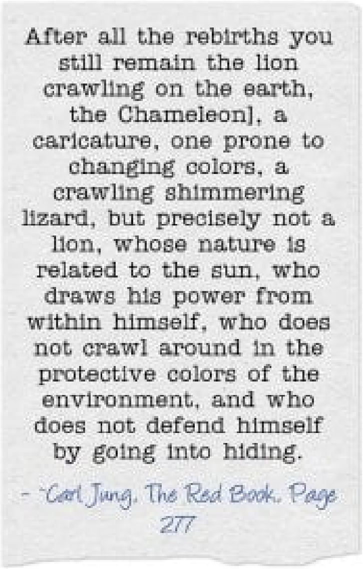
Oh Izdubar, most powerful one, what you call poison is science. In our country, we are nurtured on it from youth, and that may be one reason why we haven't properly flourished and remain so dwarfish. When I see you, however, it seems to me as if we are all somewhat poisoned.

- ~Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 278



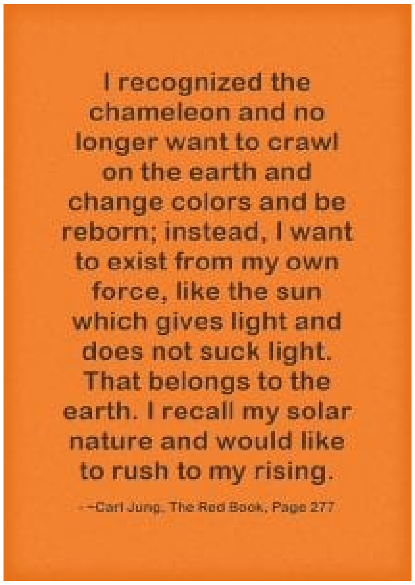
After all the rebirths you still remain the lion crawling on the earth, the Chameleon], a caricature, one prone to changing colors, a crawling shimmering lizard, but precisely not a lion, whose nature is related to the sun, who draws his power from within himself, who does not crawl around in the protective colors of the environment, and who does not defend himself by going into hiding.

- ~Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 277



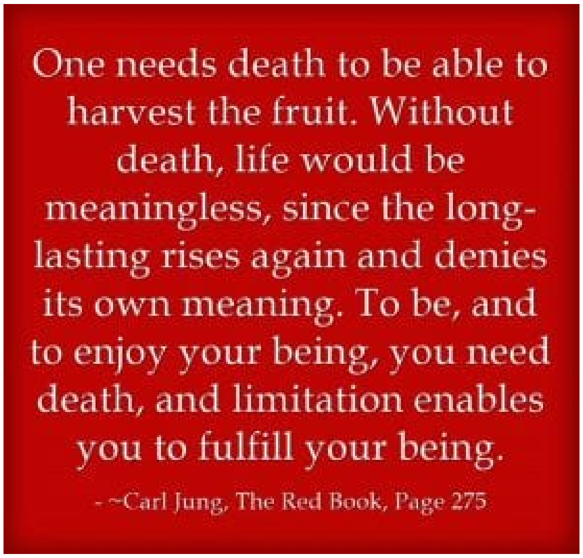
After all the rebirths you still remain the lion crawling on the earth, the Chameleon], a caricature, one prone to changing colors, a crawling shimmering lizard, but precisely not a lion, whose nature is related to the sun, who draws his power from within himself, who does not crawl around in the protective colors of the environment, and who does not defend himself by going into hiding.

- ~Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 277



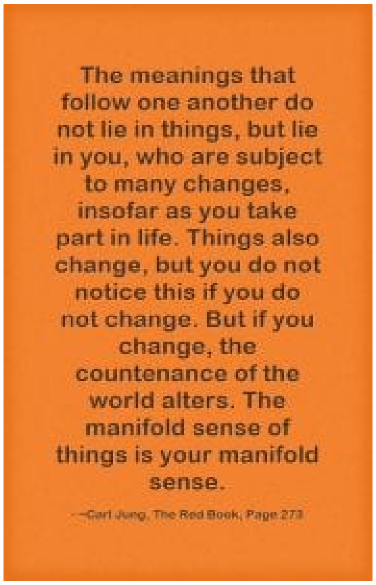
I recognized the chameleon and no longer want to crawl on the earth and change colors and be reborn; instead, I want to exist from my own force, like the sun which gives light and does not suck light. That belongs to the earth. I recall my solar nature and would like to rush to my rising.

- ~Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 277



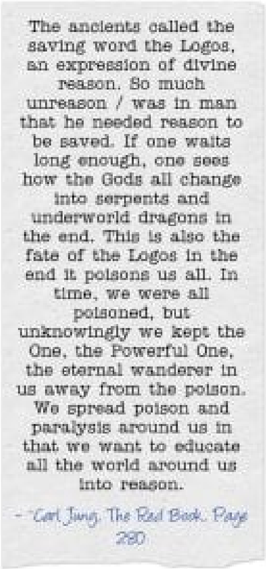
One needs death to be able to harvest the fruit. Without death, life would be meaningless, since the long-lasting rises again and denies its own meaning. To be, and to enjoy your being, you need death, and limitation enables you to fulfill your being.

- ~Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 275



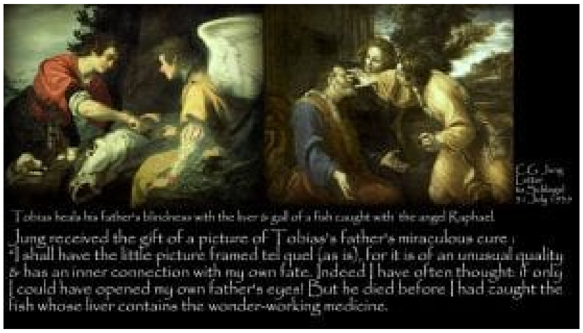
The meanings that follow one another do not lie in things, but lie in you, who are subject to many changes, insofar as you take part in life. Things also change, but you do not notice this if you do not change. But if you change, the countenance of the world alters. The manifold sense of things is your manifold sense.

- ~Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 273



The ancients called the saving word the Logos, an expression of divine reason. So much unreason / was in man that he needed reason to be saved. If one waits long enough, one sees how the Gods all change into serpents and underworld dragons in the end. This is also the fate of the Logos in the end it poisons us all. In time, we were all poisoned, but unknowingly we kept the One, the Powerful One, the eternal wanderer in us away from the poison. We spread poison and paralysis around us in that we want to educate all the world around us into reason.

- ~Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 280



C.G. Jung
Letter to Schlegel
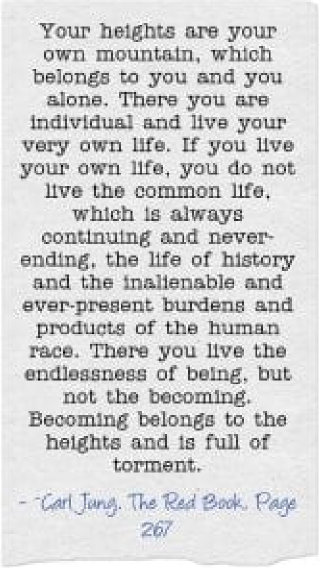
31 July [illegible]

Tobias heals his father's blindness with the liver & gall of a fish caught with the angel Raphael.

Jung received the gift of a picture of Tobias's father's miraculous cure :
"I shall have the little picture framed tel quel (as is), for it is of an unusual quality & has an inner connection with my own fate. Indeed I have often thought: if only I could have opened my own father's eyes! But he died before I had caught the fish whose liver contains the wonder-working medicine.



Your heights are your own mountain, which belongs to you and you alone. There you are individual and live your very own life. If you live your own life, you do not live the common life, which is always continuing and never-ending, the life of history and the inalienable and ever-present burdens and products of the human race. There you live the endlessness of being, but not the becoming. Becoming belongs to the heights and is full of torment.

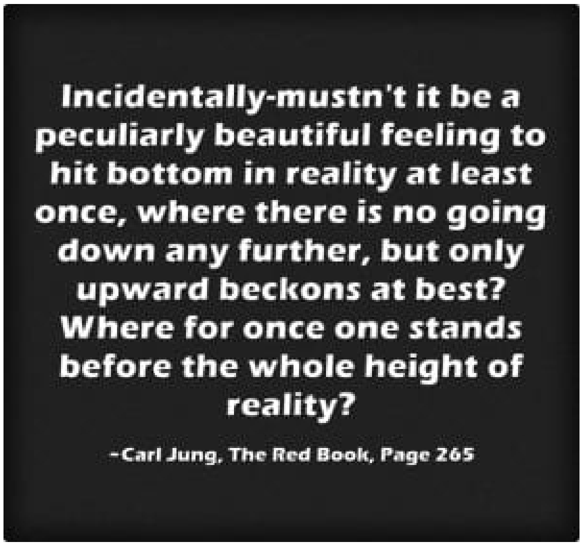
At your low point you are no longer distinct from your fellow beings. You are not ashamed and do not regret it, since insofar as you live the life of your fellow beings and descend to their lowliness you also climb into the holy stream of common life, where you are no longer an individual on a high mountain, but a fish among fish, a frog among frogs.

- ~Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 266



Incidentally-mustn't it be a peculiarly beautiful feeling to hit bottom in reality at least once, where there is no going down any further, but only upward beckons at best? Where for once one stands before the whole height of reality?

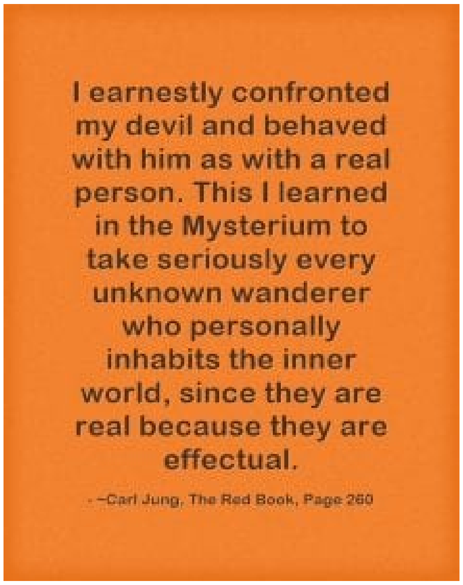
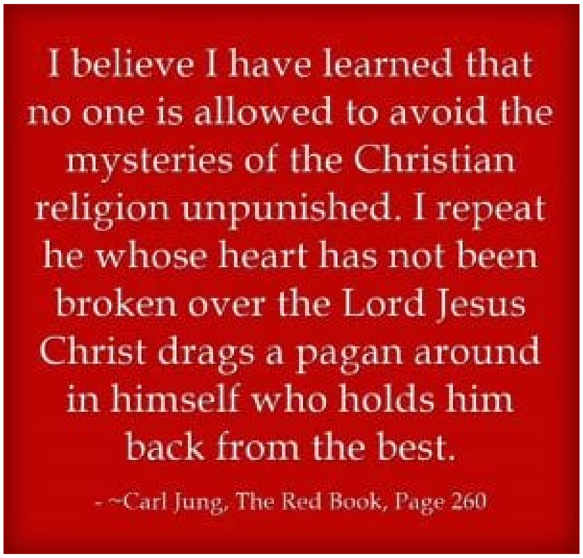
If ever you have the rare opportunity to speak with the devil, then do not forget to confront him in all seriousness. He is your devil after all. The devil as the adversary is your own other standpoint; he tempts you and sets a stone in your path where you least want it.

- ~Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 261



I earnestly confronted my devil and behaved with him as with a real person. This I learned in the Mysterium to take seriously every unknown wanderer who personally inhabits the inner world, since they are real because they are effectual.

- ~Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 260



I believe I have learned that no one is allowed to avoid the mysteries of the Christian religion unpunished. I repeat he whose heart has not been broken over the Lord Jesus Christ drags a pagan around in himself who holds him back from the best.

- ~Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 260

It is most important that you should be born; you ought to come into this world—otherwise you cannot realize the self, and the purpose of this world has been missed. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 28

It is utterly important that one should be in this world, that one really fulfills one's entelechia, the germ of life which one is. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 28

You see, the shoot must come out of the ground, and if the personal spark has never gotten into the ground, nothing will come out of it; no linga [creative core] or Kundalini will be there, because you are still staying in the infinity that was before. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 29

For you should leave some trace in this world which notifies that you have been here, that something has happened. If nothing happens of this kind you have not realized yourself; the germ of life has fallen, say, into a thick layer of air that kept it suspended. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 28

Everything that has life is individual—a dog, a plant, everything living—but of course it is far from being conscious of its individuality. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 5

Individuation only takes place when you are conscious of it, but individuation is always there from the beginning of your existence. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 5

The instinct of individuation is found everywhere in life, for there is no life on earth that is not individual. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 4

The world itself becomes a reflection of the psyche. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 50

There are plenty of people who are not yet born. They all seem to be here, they walk about—but as a matter of fact, they are not yet born, because they are behind a glass wall, they are in the womb. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 28

They are in the world only on parole and are soon to be returned to the pleroma [fullness] where they started originally. They have not formed a connection with this world; they are suspended in the air; they are neurotic, living the provisional life. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 28.

You must believe in this world, make roots, do the best you can, even if you have to believe in the most absurd things—to believe, for instance, that this world is very definite, that it matters absolutely whether such-and-such a treaty is made or not. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 29

You see, the shoot must come out of the ground, and if the personal spark has never gotten into the ground, nothing will come out of it; no linga [creative core] or Kundalini will be there, because you are still staying in the infinity that was before. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 29

Today, instead of the sea or leviathan, we say analysis, which is equally dangerous. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 17

We could not possibly judge this world if we had not also a standpoint outside, and that is given by the symbolism of religious experiences. Carl Jung, Kundalini Seminar, Page 27

Small children are very old; later on we soon grow younger. In our middle age we are youngest, precisely at the time when we have completely or almost completely lost contact with the collective unconscious, the samskaras. We grow older again only as with the mounting years we remember the samskaras anew. Carl Jung, The Psychology of Kundalini Yoga, Page 74.

Individuation is not that you become an ego—you would then become an individualist. You know, an individualist is a man who did not succeed in individuating; he is a philosophically distilled egotist. Carl Jung, The Psychology of Kundalini Yoga, Pages 39-40.

If you succeed in remembering yourself, if you succeed in making a difference between yourself and that outburst of passion, then you discover the self; you begin to individuate. Carl Jung, The Psychology of Kundalini Yoga, Pages 39-40.

Without personal life, without the here and now, we cannot attain to the supra-personal. Personal life must first be fulfilled in order that the process of the supra-personal side of the psyche can be introduced. Carl Jung, The Psychology of Kundalini Yoga, Page 66.

The fairy tale is the great mother of the novel, and has even more universal validity than the most-avidly read novel of your time. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 262.

If I accept death, then my tree greens, since dying increases life. If I plunge into the death encompassing the world, then my buds break open. How much our life needs death! Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 275.

He who sleeps in the grave of the millennia dreams a wonderful dream. He dreams a primordially ancient dream. He dreams of the rising sun. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 272
If you marry the ordered to the chaos, you produce the divine child, the supreme meaning beyond meaning and meaninglessness. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 235
Great is he who is in love, since love is the present act of the great creator, the present moment of the becoming and lapsing of the world. Mighty is he who loves. But whoever distances himself from love, feels himself powerful. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 253.
If you go to thinking, take your heart with you. If you go to love, take your head with you. Love is empty without thinking, thinking hollow without love. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 253.
But the brightness of love seems to come from the fact that love is visible life and action. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 252.
To live oneself means to be one's own task. Never say that it is a pleasure to live oneself It will be no joy but a long suffering, since you must become your own creator. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 249.
Day does not exist through itself, night does not exist through itself. The reality that exists through itself is day and night. So the reality is meaning and absurdity. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 242.
The meaning of events is the way of salvation that you create. The meaning of events comes from the possibility of life in this world that you create. It is the mastery of this world and the assertion of your soul in this world. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 239.
Depths and surface should mix so that new life can develop. Yet the new life does not develop outside of us, but within us. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 239.
To the extent that the Christianity of this time lacks madness, it lacks divine life. Take note of what the ancients taught us in images madness is divine. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 238.
I too was afraid, since we had forgotten that God is terrible. Christ taught God is love. But you should know that love is also terrible. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 235.
Great is the power of the way. In it Heaven and Hell grow together, and in it the power of the Below and the power of the Above unite. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 308.
I had to recognize that I am only the expression and symbol of the soul. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 234.
Magic is the working of men on men, but your magic action does not affect your neighbor; it affects you first, and only if you withstand it does an invisible effect pass from you to your neighbor. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 308.
The moon is dead. Your soul went to the moon, to the preserver of souls. Thus the soul moved toward death. I went into the inner death and saw that outer dying is better than inner death. And I decided to die outside and to live within. For that reason I turned away and sought the place of the inner life. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 267.
Where reason abides one needs no magic. Hence our time no longer needs magic. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 314.
Magic is a way of living. If one has done one's best to steer the chariot, and one then notices that a greater other is actually steering it, then magical operation takes place. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 314.
The ancients devised magic to compel fate. They needed it to determine outer fate. We need it to determine inner fate and to find the way that we are unable to conceive. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 311.
Death gives me durability and solidity. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 323.
The knowledge of your heart is how your heart is. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 234.
You should carry the monastery in yourself. The desert is within you. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 230.
Sacrifice is not destruction; sacrifice is the foundation stone of what is to come. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 230.
The ancients lived their symbols, since the world had not yet become real for them. Carl Jung, Liber Novus, Page 236.
Thus I saw that the lover survives, and that he is the one who unwittingly grants hospitality to the Gods. Carl Jung to Philemon, Liber Novus, Page 315
The intuitive is always bothered by the reality of things; he fails from the standpoint of realities; he is always out for the possibilities of life.
The spirit of this time would like to hear of use and value. I also thought this way, and my humanity still thinks this way. But that other spirit forces me nevertheless to speak, beyond justification, use, and meaning. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 229

But I did not consider that the spirit of the depths from time immemorial and for all the future possesses a greater power than the spirit of this time, who changes with the generations. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 229

You seek the path. I warn you away from my own. It can also be the wrong way for you. May each go his own way. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 231

Who exhausts the mystery of love? Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 315.

I had still not become a man again who carried within himself the conflict between a longing for the world and a longing for the spirit. I did not live either of these longings, but I lived myself and was a merrily greening tree in a remote spring forest. Thus, I learned to live without the world and spirit; and I was amazed how well I could live like this. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 277.

Oh Izdubar, most powerful one, what you call poison is science. In our country, we are nurtured on it from youth, and that may be one reason why we haven't properly flourished and remain so dwarfish. When I see you, however, it seems to me as if we are all somewhat poisoned. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 278.

After all the rebirths you still remain the lion crawling on the earth, the Chameleon], a caricature, one prone to changing colors, a crawling shimmering lizard, but precisely not a lion, whose nature is related to the sun, who draws his power from within himself, who does not crawl around in the protective colors of the environment, and who does not defend himself by going into hiding. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 277.

I recognized the chameleon and no longer want to crawl on the earth and change colors and be reborn; instead, I want to exist from my own force, like the sun which gives light and does not suck light. That belongs to the earth. I recall my solar nature and would like to rush to my rising. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 277.

One needs death to be able to harvest the fruit. Without death, life would be meaningless, since the long-lasting rises again and denies its own meaning. To be, and to enjoy your being, you need death, and limitation enables you to fulfill your being. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 275.

The meanings that follow one another do not lie in things, but lie in you, who are subject to many changes, insofar as you take part in life. Things also change, but you do not notice this if you do not change. But if you change, the countenance of the world alters. The manifold sense of things is your manifold sense. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 273.

The ancients called the saving word the Logos, an expression of divine reason. So much unreason / was in man that he needed reason to be saved. If one waits long enough, one sees how the Gods all change into serpents and underworld dragons in the end. This is also the fate of the Logos in the end it poisons us all. In time, we were all poisoned, but unknowingly we kept the One, the Powerful One, the eternal wanderer in us away from the poison. We spread poison and paralysis around us in that we want to educate all the world around us into reason. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 280.

Through comprehending the dark, the nocturnal, the abyssal in you, you become utterly simple. And you prepare to sleep through the millennia like everyone else, and you sleep down into the womb of the millennia, and your walls resound with ancient temple chants. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 267.

Your heights are your own mountain, which belongs to you and you alone. There you are individual and live your very own life. If you live your own life, you do not live the common life, which is always continuing and never-ending, the life of history and the inalienable and ever-present burdens and products of the human race. There you live the endlessness of being, but not the becoming. Becoming belongs to the heights and is full of torment. Carl Jung, The Red Book, Page 267.

At your low point you are no longer distinct from your fellow beings. You are not ashamed and do not regret it, since insofar as you live the life of your fellow beings and descend to their lowliness you also climb into the holy stream of common life, where you are no longer an individual on a high mountain, but a fish among fish, a frog among frogs. Carl Jung on the deaths of Emma Jung and Toni Wolff (2019-06-30 05:52)

[Carl Jung on the deaths of Emma Jung and Toni Wolff]

Jung reflected further on this issue after the death of Toni Wolff in 1953 and Emma Jung in 1955.

In the published version of Memories, Jung discussed the issue of reincarnation, and noted that:

"Until a few years ago I could not discover anything convincing in this respect, although I kept a sharp lookout for signs. Recently, however, I observed in myself a series of dreams which would seem to describe the process of reincarnation in a deceased person of my acquaintance."

As ever, Jung's discussions in the protocols were more candid: the person in question turns out to be Toni Wolff.

On September 23, 1957, Jung narrated a dream he had had of her to Aniela Jaffe.

In the dream, she had returned to life, as if there had been a type of misunderstanding that she had died, and she had returned to live a further part of her life. Aniela Jaffe asked Jung if he thought this could indicate a possible.. . who are the dead, and what does it mean to answer them?

Rebirth. Jung replied that with his wife he had a sense of a great detachment or distance. By contrast, he felt that Toni Wolff was close. Jaffé then asked him whether something that one has not completed in one life has to be continued in a next life.
Jung replied that his wife reached something that Toni Wolff didn't reach and that rebirth would constitute a terrible increase of actuality for her.

He had the impression that Toni Wolff was nearer the earth, that she could manifest herself better to him, whilst his wife was on another level where he couldn't reach her.

He concluded that Toni Wolff was in the neighborhood, that she was nearer the sphere of three dimensional existence, and hence had the chance to come into existence again,

He had the impression that for her a continuation of three dimensional existence would not be meaningless.

He felt that higher insight hindered the wish for re-embodiment. The Jung-Jaffe Protocols

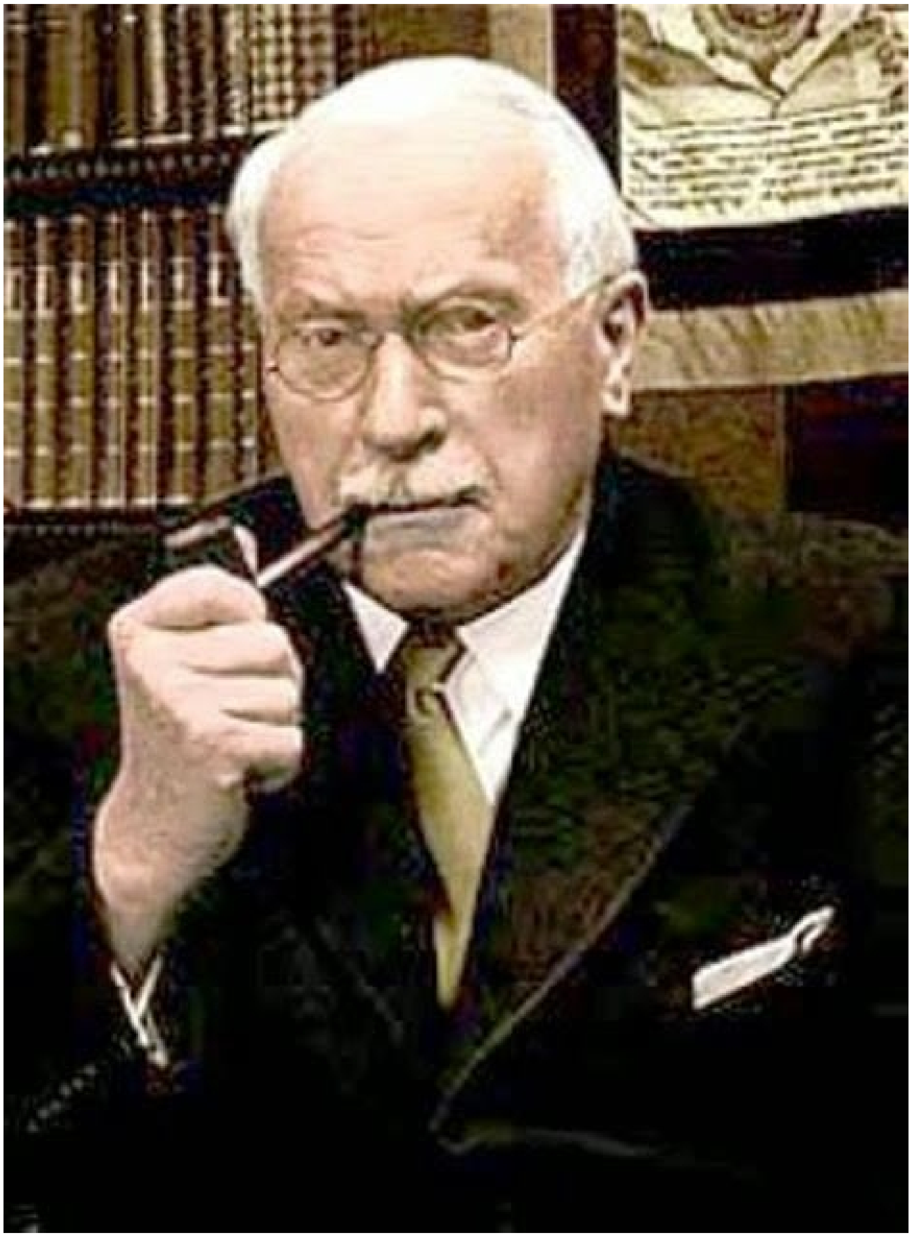
On November 2, 1945, Jung wrote to Cary Baynes: (2019-06-30 05:56)



On November 2, 1945, Jung wrote to Cary Baynes:
“We have landed indeed, after the nightmare of the war, in the precincts of hell.

The war was a long drawn out suspense, in which everything seemed to be still existent yet provisional.

One lived from day to day, never certain of to-morrow.

An incredible atmosphere of horror was secretly present everywhere.

When peace came at last, the immediate of oppression vanished, but only to make room to a feeling of almost cosmic doom.
The atomic bomb or at least the thought of such a monstrous menace fitted the picture completely.

We are still the island in a sea of abomination and we feel like relics of a faraway Golden Age. It is wonderful that we still can enjoy the beauty of high culture, but we know, that it is a remnant and that it’s days are counted . . .

Carol Baumann has given me some news about Kristine Mann.

I hope that her suffering will soon come to an end.

The soul seems to detach from the body pretty early and there seems to be almost no realization of death.

What follows is well-nigh incredible.

It seems to be an adventure greater and more expected than anything one could dream of.

Whatever we do and try in analysis is the first steps towards that goal.

That is the only thing, which has accompanied me across the threshold.” Carl Jung to Cary Baynes, 2 November 1945, (Cary Baynes papers).

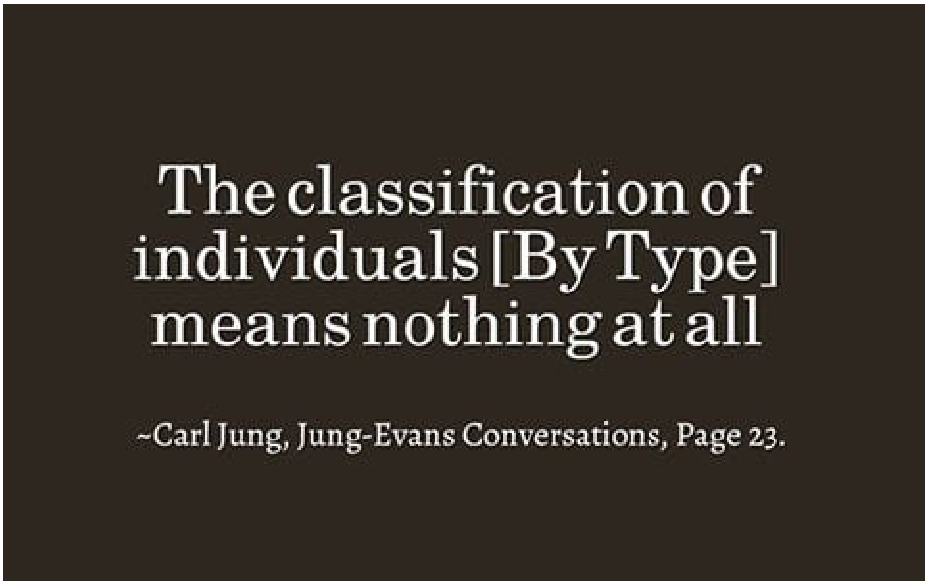
Dr. Jung on misconceptions about "Types." (2019-06-30 06:01)

[1]



The classification of individuals [By Type] means nothing at all

The classification of individuals [By Type] means nothing at all Carl Jung, Jung-Evans Conversations, Page 23.

In my book about types I have given a number of examples illustrating my modus operandi. Classification did not interest me very much. It is a side-issue with only indirect importance to the therapist." Carl Jung, Letters Vol. II, Pages 550-552

Dr. Jung: Naturally I have devoted a great deal of attention to that painful question, you know!

Question: And reached a conclusion?

Dr. Jung: Well, you see, the type is nothing static. It changes in the course of life, but I most certainly was characterized by thinking.
I always thought, from early childhood on, and I had a great deal of intuition too.

And I had a definite difficulty with feeling, and my relation to reality was not particularly brilliant.

I was often at variance with the reality of things. Now that gives you all the necessary data for a diagnosis! Carl Jung, C.G. Jung, Speaking, Pages 435-6.

Dr. Evans: Of course, one of the very common misconceptions, at least in my opinion, about your work among some of the writers in America is that they have characterized your discussion of introversion and extroversion as suggesting that the world is made up of only two kinds of people, introverts and extroverts. I'm sure you have been aware of this. Would you like to comment on it? In other words, do you perceive of the world as one made up only of people who are extreme introverts and people who are extreme extroverts?

Dr. Jung: Bismarck once said, "God may protect me against my friends; with my enemies I can deal myself alone."

You know how people are.

They have a catch word, and then everything is schematized along that word.

There is no such thing as a pure ⍰ extrovert or a pure introvert.

Such a man would be in the lunatic asylum.

Those are only terms to designate a certain penchant, a certain tendency.

For instance, the tendency to be more influenced by environmental influences, or more influenced by the subjective fact—that's all.

There are people who are fairly well-balanced who are just as much influenced from within as from without, or just as little.

And so with all the definite classifications, you know, they are only a sort of point to refer to, points for orientation.

There is no such thing as a schematic classification.

Often you have great trouble even to make out to what type a man belongs, either because he is very well balanced or he is very neurotic.

The last one is hard because when you are neurotic, then you have always a certain dissociation of personality.

And then too, the people themselves don’t know when they react consciously or when they react unconsciously.

So you can talk to somebody, and you think he is conscious.

He knows what he says, and to your amazement you discover after a while that he is quite unconscious of it, doesn’t know it.

It is a long and painstaking procedure to find out of what a man is conscious and of what he is not conscious, because the unconscious plays in him all the time.

Certain things are conscious; certain things are unconscious; but you can’t always tell.

You have to ask people, "Now are you conscious of what you say?"

Or, "Did you notice?"

And you discover suddenly that there are quite a number of things that he didn’t know at all.

For instance, certain people have many reasons; everybody can see them. They themselves don’t know it at all.

Dr. Evans: Then this whole matter of extremes—introvert and extrovert—you say is a schematic approach, a frame of reference.

Dr. Jung: My whole scheme of typology is merely a sort of orientation.

There is such a factor as introversion; there is such a factor as extroversion.

The classification of individuals means nothing at all. It is only the instrumentality, or what I call "practical psychology," used to explain, for instance, the husband to a wife, or vice versa.

It is very often the case, for instance—I might say it is almost a rule, but I don’t want to make too many rules in order not to be schematic— that an introvert marries an extrovert for compensation, or another type marries a countertype to complement himself.

For example, a man who has made a certain amount of money is a good business man, but he has no education.

His dream is, of course, a grand piano at home and being around artists, painters or singers or God knows what, and intellectual people; and he marries accordingly a wife of that type, in order to have that too.

She has it, and she marries him because he has a lot of money.

These compensations go on all the time.

When you study marriages, you can see it easily.

And, of course, we analysts have to deal a lot with marriages, particularly those that go wrong, because the types are too different sometimes and they don't understand each other at all.

You see, the main values of the extrovert are anathema to the introvert, and he says, "To hell with the world, I think."

His wife interprets this as his megalomania.

But it is just as if an extrovert said to an introvert, "Now, look here fellow; these here are the facts; this is reality."

And he's right! And the other says, "But I think, I hold—," and that sounds like nonsense to the extrovert because he doesn't know that the other one, without knowing it, is beholding an inner world, an inner reality; and that other one may be right, as he may be wrong, even if he found himself upon God knows what solid facts.

Take, for instance, the interpretation of statistics.

You can prove almost anything with statistics.

What is more a fact than a statistic? Carl Jung, Evans Conversations, Page 23.

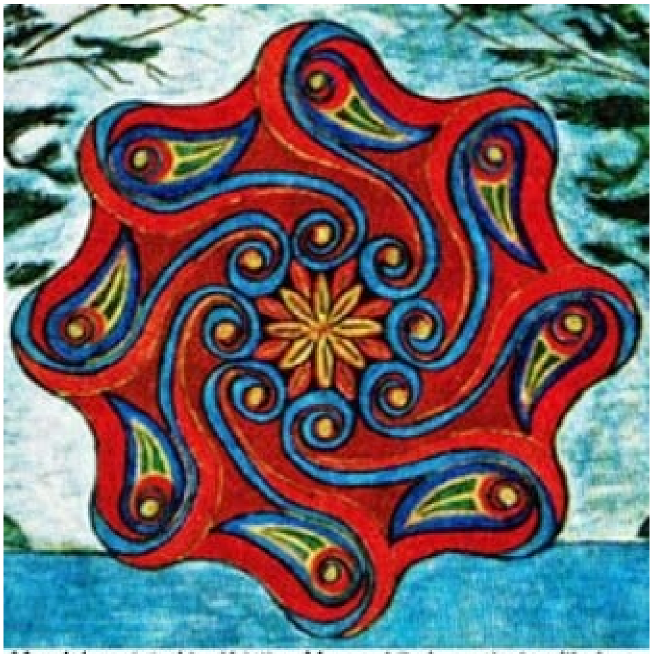
Carl Jung and My illness proved to be a most valuable experience... (2019-06-30 06:32)

[1]



Mandala painted by Kristine Mann while in analysis with Jung

On February 1, 1945, Carl Jung wrote of his experience to Kristine Mann:

My illness proved to be a most valuable experience, which gave me the inestimable opportunity of a glimpse behind the veil.
The only difficulty is to get rid of the body, to get quite naked and void of the world and the ego-will.

When you can give up the crazy will to live and when you seemingly fall into a bottomless mist, then the truly real life begins with everything which you were meant to be and never reached.

It is something ineffably grand. I was free, completely free and whole, as I never felt before . . . Death is the hardest thing from the outside and as long as we are outside it.

But once inside you taste of such completeness and peace and fulfillment that you don't want to return … I will not last too long anymore.

I am marked. But life has fortunately become provisional.

It has become a transitory prejudice, a working hypothesis for the time being but not existence. Carl Jung; C. G. Jung letters 1: 1906- 1950; pp. 357-9.
